SILVER COIN IN MEXICO

Government's Plan to Give the Currency Fixed Value.

Senor Jose Y. Limantour, Minister of Finance, Says Its Success Is Assured—Senor Creel on the Mexican Central.

Official disclosure can now be made of the practical completion of the Mexican Government's plan to give that country's silver currency fixed value.

Exceptional progress has been scored recently, of which there has appeared no official suggestion. Important developments of this character have taken place in New York during the past week—developments of such character that Senor Jose Y. Limantour, the official head of Mexico's Department of Finance, is unequivocal in his declaration that "success is now fully assured."

Limantour, who ranks with Diaz in the confidence of all Mexico, is not a careless enthusiast. A measurer of words, he shows the trained diplomat's caution in every expression. But when he does have something to say he can say it with effective emphasis. Thus, there is far more than passing consequence in this outspoken statement that he made to me yesterday:

"Do we hope to succeed? We are beyond the period of hope; we have reached the point where we can say we are sure."

It was in his suite at the Waldorf—superb apartments converted into a Government Minister's workshop—that I had the opportunity to meet the courtly Limantour. A gracious, impressive man this, who rounds out conservative history in Mexico. He likes New York, admires the greatness of it—has unstinted applause for the broad ways of business interests here. In the United States, his saying is, Mexico finds the natural, safe, and satisfactory model. And as earnest in applause of this character as Limantour himself are Mexican bankers, with whom it is his policy to keep in close touch—bankers like Eduardo Meade, whose bank is that of San Luis Potosi, and Enrique C. Creel, head of the Banco Central Mexicano, he who is publicly acclaimed the J. P. Morgan of Mexico. It was to Mr. Creel that I owed the honor of presentation to Mr. Limantour and the opportunity to obtain official review of the plan and scope of his Government's now developed fiscal policy.

TO MAKE CURRENCY STABLE.

Succinctly the Mexican purpose is to make Government currency stable—to give to Mexican coinage absolutely fixed value.

"It is not at all our aim," says Limantour, "to try to increase the market value of silver. What the Government seeks to accomplish is to make sure that our silver money shall stop its disturbing fluctuations."

And how "disturbing" current money fluctuations are in the Mexican business world is made very clear by pertinent illustrations that the Finance Minister quotes, illustrations that forcefully tell of conditions that directly affect every branch of trade at home and all commercial and financial relations that are international. Doubtless one must from day to day can tell what may be of the value of silver, but that the strength of his resources. Each variation in the sterling exchange market—variation in the commercial price of silver—marks Mexican property up or down arbitrarily. And to such extent does this control that the ordinary business man in Mexico is not actually a business man of all, but perforce a speculator in exchange. Of this we are all informed. But—as Limantour puts it—observation from the distance differs very materially from suffering on the spot.

It is not just to establish a gold coinage basis that present Government plans aim at," Says the Minister on this subject:

"We are not trying to make Mexico a gold country. For many and varied reasons such effort would be futile. The undertaking would be foolish. A country of heavy exports 40 per cent. in silver, a country whose silver production has through all the generations been the foremost constituent of national wealth, is barred from any such venture for time to time is thoughtlessly suggested by some monometallist prophets. We are committed to the use of silver by reason of conditions that are not at all debatable. Indeed, your publicists here and they in Europe who understand the situation are undivided in appreciating this phase of this question.

"Our aim, our necessity," continues Señor Limantour, "is not to interfere with the use of silver or to put gold basis restrictions upon it. Our aim, our necessity, is to have our silver money worth, day by day, and year in and year out, some certain fixed value, upon which business can rely, upon which business contracts can be safely based—which will give business interests the opportunity to proceed sanely. With this end accomplished, we put Mexico far forward; and to-day it can be accepted as sure that success is attained.

Details? There are many. They have exceeding interest, too. But to print them all at this juncture would be improper—"inopportune" is the diplomatic word. A summary by Mexico's Finance Minister himself runs in this way:

Our plan corresponds in various ways to what takes in the United States colonial financial policy. In the Philippines you are obliged to provide a silver currency, and it must have maintained, fixed value. This is not true merely as to the United States, but is a governing rule with France, Holland and Great Britain, all having colonies with similar needs, requiring similar value assurance. And with the record of accomplishment in these instances before us, the problem we have had to solve has, as it has advanced, grown more and more easy of solution."

THE MINISTER'S PLANS.

Without attempting to quote the explicit phraseology of this statesman who in Mexican annals will have fame corresponding to that of John Sherman in American financial history, herewith are details of what Limantour proposes—what he has already actually arranged:

There is to be a new Mexican dollar coined.

There will be $100,000,000 of this coinage.

This dollar will be made a legal tender for every debt and account collectible in Mexico.

Back of this dollar—guaranteeing it—will be a specific gold deposit of $25,000,000.

The present dollar will be no longer recognized in any legal sense as Mexican money. It will be pushed absolutely into classification as merchandise. Free and unlimited coinage—as now prevailing—will be abolished. The only Government issue will be under the provisions that guarantee the new $100,000,000.

How much Mexican silver money is now outstanding? Nobody can make any approximate calculation. Since first Mexico started the issue there has been emitted $2,400,000,000. As through the years the bullion's market value has fluctuated, this output has naturally had many changing figures. When, aforetime, silver as merchandise rose to high figures Mexican coinage had its chief value for melting. Time was when the present friendless coin went current readily at its face and better in New York and at London and Paris. Prior to 1859 it had even a quasi legal-tender quality in this town.

Much more than the majority of outstanding Mexican dollars are outside of Mexico. They have been shipped out of Mexico in these latter days as mere merchandise, not in any actual money capacity whatsoever. And this, in the view of Señor Limantour, warrants one radical provision in the Government's new fiscal plan—the provision that Mexican dollars of the present coinage shall not return to Mexico except as merchandise and subject to an import tax.

It has been necessary, of course, for Limantour and his banker associates and advisers to keep in view the fact that some abnormal condition might at times develop to affect the status of the new coinage. It might be that at some point and in an extraordinary situation there could be a surplus of the Government coinage, and it is conceivable that under some circumstances shopkeepers or bankers might decline to make exchange with buyers on the fixed fifty-cent basis. Therefore this has been determined upon:

Whenever for any reason a surplus offering of the coinage shall show effect upon value the Government will enter the market as a buyer (for gold) of whatever volume of coin offers at even the slightest fraction below the guaranteed parity. And as there will be $25,000,000 of gold so available, $50,000,000 of the coins (one-half of the total issue) can be thus immediately withdrawn from circulation—held ready, of course, for reutterance as normal conditions later demand.

And as to the remotely possible complication of the new coin rising in the market above the Government's guarantee of 50 cents in gold? This, too, has been considered. Upon this account, indeed, there has been especial safeguarding. One of the important functions of the international silver commission (conspicuous members of which are now in this city) is to obtain from the silver-using countries of the world an agreement that bullion for coinage shall be taken only when it is at or below the ratio of 32 to 1—cutting in two Mr. William J. Bryan's 16 to 1 prescription.

AS TO BUSINESS EFFECTS.

Now, as to business effects: Here is illustration, apt and clear, cited to me yesterday by no less an authority than Señor Enrique C. Creel:

"There was issued to-day in Wall Street the annual statistical exhibit of the Mexican Central Railroad, of whose Board of Directors I have just become a member. The calendar year 1902 is covered; and (including additional mileage acquired during the year) the company earned $37,000,000. That was in silver, and against the amount were expenses of $7,000,000, also in silver, leaving a silver showing of net earnings of $20,000,000. But Mexican silver dollars last year were down to 39 cents apiece, and therefore the railroad's gold earnings above expenses amounted to only $7,800,000.

"Had there been in existence last year the policy which the Mexican Government prepares now to enforce—had the $20,000,000 silver surplus been on the guaranteed fifty-cent basis, the net gold earnings would have been $10,000,000, or $2,200,000 more than was possible under the prevailing system. And this difference (approximating a gain of 28 per cent.) would have been sufficient to have paid the company's entire bond interest, every fixed charge, and have left still available a surplus sufficient to pay 4 per cent. dividends upon the company's total capital stock."

Clearer or more forceful illustration could scarcely be provided. Yet, adds Mr. Creel:

"What is true of this one corporation, the Mexican Central, our country's chief railroad, is correspondingly true in every branch of business all Mexico over."

What Mexico is doing, has arranged, Mexico is not doing alone. China has similar attending plans. Japan, embarrassed by the continuing disposition of gold to flee the country, has committed herself to Mexico as a ready co-operator, an adopter of the same policy—a policy which, in Mr. Limantour's words, is "the policy of the United States of America."

Of silver coinage known now to be outstanding there is approximately $3,000,000,000. People who use it—directly depend upon it—aggregate 800,000,000.

When will the new Mexican policy come into effect? Before next New Year's is the Mexican Government's confident anticipation.

Special to The New York Times.

AUSTIN, Texas, May 8.—Jackson Smith, assistant to President Metcalf of the Mexican International Railroad, says that railroad construction in Mexico has practically ceased and will not be resumed until stability of the monetary situation in that country is established.

"When that is accomplished there will be one of the greatest building eras in Mexico that the country has ever seen," he said. "It matters little whether the value of the dollar be fixed at 20 or 50 cents, so long as it is a fixed value. With a fixed value there will be little difficulty in negotiating gold bonds.

"Until that is done there will be little railroad construction in Mexico other than that which seems absolutely necessary. Many surveys have been made, and everything is ready for the work except the confidence of the men who have gold money to invest. They are assured that their money will bear interest in silver, but what they want is interest in gold."

SINGERS SNUB SOCIETY FOLK.

Mme. Nordica and M. Edouard de Reszke Fail to Keep an Engagement in Atlanta.

Special to The New York Times.

ATLANTA, Ga., May 8.—Atlanta society is excited over a snub administered by Mme. Nordica and M. Edouard de Reszke, who appeared here yesterday. It occurred to several leaders that it would be a nice thing to entertain the singers. The details were worked out by Mrs. Wilfred Lawson Peel, and Frank Weldon, acting for Mrs. Peel, issued invitations to Mme. Nordica and M. De Reszke.

The singers accepted, and elaborate preparations were made for the affair. Society people were on hand to meet the artists, but they did not appear or send excuses. When the guests realized the situation there was great excitement.

It appears that when Mme. Nordica and M. de Reszke accepted the invitations they supposed that John S. Duss, with whose band they are traveling, had also been invited. When they learned that Mr. Duss had not been invited they resolved not to go.

POLICEMAN AND SON LOST IN EAST RIVER

Policeman James Howard, thirty-one years old, of the East One Hundred and Twenty-sixth Street Station, and his seven-year-old son, George, were drowned in the East River at the mouth of Bronx Kills soon after 5 o'clock yesterday afternoon by the upsetting of the flat-bottomed boat in which they and James Howard, Jr., four years old, the policeman's other child, were returning from a day's fishing. The smaller boy was rescued, barely alive, and was taken to the Lebanon Hospital, where at a late hour it was said he would be returned to his mother to-day.

Howard had been a policeman since July 14 last, and had been attached to the precinct since November. He was a lover of aquatic sports, and was a member of the Seawanhaka Boat Club, which has its house at North Beach. He had won medals for proficiency in oarsmanship, and was also noted as a swimmer, with a couple of rescues from drowning to his credit. His body, when it was discovered at 6:30 o'clock last night, lying at the bottom in about four feet of water off the Sunken Meadows, had a severe cut over the right eye. He had struck a rock while diving for his oldest boy, and had been stunned.

Father and children had spent the day in the neighborhood of North Brother Island and were on their way back to the flat at One Hundred and Thirtieth Street and the Harlem River, from which they had started. They had gained a point about 100 feet off the east shore of Randall's Island when a very fast white steamboat with two stacks darted through Hell Gate on her way up the Sound.

She was recognized as the twin-screw New Haven flyer Richard Peck. A swell in her wake, breaking into a crested billow as it passed the Sunken Meadows, struck the little skiff, overturning it instantly.

The tide was at the flood and running very fast. Howard swam first to the smaller child, who had been in the bow of the boat. Quickly he carried him back and tossed him on the bottom of the skiff, telling him to hold on for his life. Then he went for the other. The boy sank, and Howard dived as he reached the spot. He never came up.

Other fishermen in boats and persons on the Bronx and island shores were hurrying to the rescue, among them many railroad men who had seen the accident from the freight yards of the New York, New Haven and Hartford Line, just across the kills. From the anchored sloop Easy Times, lying near by, came Frank A. Kenny, eighteen years old, of 230 East One Hundred and Thirty-ninth Street, who rowed the tender of the vessel. He plunged in and caught George, who had risen and sunk several times after his father was lost. Kenny threw him by the side of his brother, whose baby strength then failed him, and he fell into the water. Kenny quickly caught him and held both little fellows on the skiff until the other rowers came alongside. The second boat landed all three on the Bronx shore.

An ambulance had been called. Life seemed to linger in George, and untrained hands did their best to revive him while awaiting Dr. Rivas's arrival. He worked on the little boy patiently, but at last he shook his head and let the little hands fall.

"The child is dead," he said.

Meanwhile Mrs. Howard was hurrying back to the family home at 1,548 Park Avenue from an afternoon's visit. Her heart was heavy, for shortly after 5 o'clock, at the home of a friend, she had been seized with a premonition, which she described as "almost a vision," that her oldest boy was drowning. She knew that her husband was soon to go on duty and tried to forget her fears in supper preparations, but when her husband and children, whom she had expected to find awaiting her, did not return.

The tidings reacher her by a tardy message from the Alexander Avenue Station at about 6:30 o'clock. Just at that hour Policeman Kelly and Mate Clusker of the Harbor police sub-station at the foot of East One Hundred and Twenty-second Street, who had been sent out at the first news of the accident, found Howard's body. Within a few minutes another messenger reached the distracted woman, asking her to go to the sub-station and identify her husband.

Policeman Howard, she said, like most athletes, gave little thought to dangers, but he had a few days before been approached by a life insurance agent. He had dismissed the man, but his visit had had a depressing effect, and shortly after he had repeated more than once, "Oh, pshaw! I'm not going to die!" Soon after, however, he expressed the wish that his body be cremated when he did die.

MAY RESIST PAYMENT OF $485,000 INSURANCE.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, May 8.—It is likely that some or all of the life insurance companies, who had issued policies aggregating $485,000 on the life of Edwin N. Thayer, will contest payment, or at least cause a rigid investigation to be made. Thayer was twenty-eight years old, and all the insurance had been taken out within the past eighteen months, some of it within three months.

Thayer died the night of May 1 in the Hotel Lenox, this city. Two days before Thayer had been arrested on the charge of forging mortgages and pledging them for loans on the Boston banks. He secured bail, and on May 1, with his mother, came from his home in Newton to the Hotel Lenox, where they took adjoining rooms. Edward Creswell, a clerk in the office of Constable Fee, occupied one room with Thayer, the latter being at the time under surveillance because of new charges against him. In the morning Thayer's mother discovered that her son was dead. An autopsy showed the death was due to acute Bright's disease and congestion of the lungs. There was not the slightest indication or suspicion of suicide. Among Thayer's insurance policies are the following:

Penn Mutual, Philadelphia, $100,000; Mutual of New York, $100,000; Prudential of New Jersey, $50,000; Phoenix Mutual of Hartford, $35,000; Equitable of New York, $50,000; Connecticut Mutual, $10,000; Berkshire, $20,000; State Mutual, $10,000; National of Vermont, $25,000; John Hancock, $25,000; Provident Savings of New York, $15,000; Mutual Benefit of Newark, $5,000; Home Insurance Company of New York, $5,000. The greater part of this insurance is payable to Mr. Thayer's estate, and it is believed that it will be more than sufficient to satisfy all claims upon it.

Mrs. Thayer, the dead man's wife, is amply protected by insurance payable directly to her, which cannot be touched for any other purpose. His mother is also protected.

RICH MAN'S SON KIDNAPPED?

Special to The New York Times.

PITTSBURG, Penn., May 8.—George Walls, son of Martin Walls, a millionaire of East Pittsburg, who has been missing for about a year, is alleged to have been kidnapped. Walls disappeared from Spring Grove, York County, in the Fall of 1901. The family and friends have spent time and money in the endeavor to locate the missing man. Last week a letter was received by Walls, saying that his son had been seen in a remote portion of the county and hinting at a strange story.

With a brother of the missing boy, William Walls, who has been engaged in engineering work in the South, the father started for York County. An offer of $20,000 reward for any information as to Walls's fate is believed to be responsible for young Walls's reported reappearance.

GAS KILLS A PROFESSOR.

Special to The New York Times.

DENVER, May 8.—Robert N. Hartman, Professor of Analytical Chemistry in the Colorado School of Mines, was asphyxiated this afternoon in the gas generating plant at the school at Golden.

Charles Darwin Test, his assistant, who went from the laboratory to learn why his chief did not return, was also overcome by gas, and was not resuscitated for half an hour.

A student passed by the plant in the basement and discovered the two men apparently lifeless and summoned help.

Prof. Hartman was a native of Ghent, N. Y., and was thirty-six years old. He was graduated from Pennsylvania University in 1891 and from Johns Hopkins University in 1894. He had been Professor of Natural Sciences at Susquehanna College and instructor in chemistry in Tufts College before coming to the Colorado School of Mines in 1899. He leaves a widow and two children.

DR. LORENZ TO HIS CRITICS.

Does Not Pose as Inventor of Method He Employs, but Says He Has Systematized It.

Special to The New York Times.

NEW ORLEANS, May 8.—Dr. Lorenz, who is in the best of health, this afternoon accorded an interview, in which he answers his critics.

"It is charged that I claim to be the originator of this method," he said, "but I do not claim the priority of the treatment at all. Such priority, anyway, would not be of value. Any sensible man could make this class of invention. [Cheers.] Some smart midwife of the Middle Ages probably first tried this method. I only claim to have introduced more system, more technique and thoroughness into an old method, which was long neglected, although without sufficient reason. I am now only trying to make this method popular for the benefit that I will accrue to all mankind from it, and I think I have incidentally made quite a success of it, the deserting while being played out in the treatment of congenital foot and hip trouble.

Dr. Lorenz did not care to say more. He seems wholly indifferent to criticism and pursues the tenor of his way all unruffled. It is now said that the rumored attack upon him, planned for Washington, will either not come off or will be a very tame affair. He has developed some powerful champions here since the doctors assembled.

CHARITIES OF NEW YORK CAUSE CLASH AT ATLANTA.

D. C. Potter Charges Maladministration and Homer Folks Replies to Him with Heat.

Special to The New York Times.

ATLANTA, May 8.—New York charitable institutions and their administration caused a clash between D. C. Potter and Homer C. Folks, Commissioner of Public Charities, at to-day's session of the conference of charities and corrections. Mr. Potter charged that there was maladministration of the New York institutions. Mr. Folks construed this as a personal attack, and replied bitterly.

Mr. Potter declared that the State institutions were not properly conducted, according to statements coming from reliable persons in close touch with them, and the thirty-seven examiners he considered useless. He declared that the money wasted by and on these examiners amounted to more than all the institutions concerned could steal if they made a concerted effort to steal. He was of the opinion that private charities were doing better work.

Mr. Folks in his reply denounced Mr. Potter's statements as untrue and said that they were based on information received from "sullen journals" of New York. He spent some time in argument to show that the statements of some of the New York newspapers were not to be trusted. He did not know to what institutions Mr. Potter referred, but said that it was his aim to have the institutions conducted for the public good. As for the thirty-seven examiners, he said they were necessary and did good work in preventing imposition.

George R. Canfield of New York City spoke on "The State in its Relations to Private Charities." He declared that the private charities are public trusts, and as such should be subject in a certain sense to supervision by the Commonwealth. The State, he thought, should have the right of inspection, but not the right of regulation.

RIVALRY FOR COAL LANDS.

Special to The New York Times.

BALTIMORE, May 8.—An interesting contest is on between the Gould-Wabash interests and the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad for possession and control of coal lands in West Virginia.

A tract of 60,000 acres which the Pennsylvania-Baltimore and Ohio interests had hoped to secure has been captured by the Gould representatives. This acquisition, it is reported, caused the decision of the Wabash syndicate to stop work on the Little Kanawha and push to completion what is known as the Buckhannon and Northern Railroad.

The Buckhannon and Northern parallels the Baltimore and Ohio from Fairmont to Grafton, and follows the Tygarts River past Philippi to Bellington, where it joins the West Virginia Central. The entire right of way is secured, and some grading has been done, and the ties are being distributed along the route.

At present the Baltimore and Ohio is the only railroad to the mines in operation, but surveying corps are active in locating new branches and switches. It is reported that the Baltimore and Ohio has laid out a new line from Clarksburg into Barbour County, which has better grades. It will touch Philippi and Buckhannon, and it will open an immense tract of coal land, and will be a rival of the new Wabash line.

A. W. MACHEN RELIEVED OF HIS POSTAL DUTIES

Postmaster General Payne's Action Said to Have Been Taken in Compliance with President Roosevelt's Wishes.

WASHINGTON, May 8.—The investigation of the affairs of the Post Office Department, which has been dragging along for two months, took a sensational turn late this afternoon, when by order of Postmaster General Payne August W. Machen, General Superintendent of the free delivery system, and one of the most widely known Government officials in the United States, was relieved from his duties, and Post Office Inspector M. C. Fosnes was designated to take charge of that service. The change will take effect to-morrow morning, when Mr. Fosnes will assume charge of the Free Delivery Service. At the same time that service will pass under the control of the office of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General. Heretofore it has been under the jurisdiction of the First Assistant.

Last week Fourth Assistant Postmaster General Bristow asked Mr. Payne to suspend Machen and he refused to do so. Senator Lodge came here and urged the same action. He said that as a party matter such an official should be out of the office while the investigation is going on or the judgment of the country would be that the investigation was one-sided. If Machen was cleared the country would not believe it. The Postmaster General refused to comply.

In the interval it is said Mr. Lodge carried the matter to the President through a messenger, and was sustained by another well-known New England Senator, who has not figured in the Post Office difficulties, but is said to have proofs in his possession of a damaging character against Machen. The President is said to have been kept fully advised of the results of the investigation and to have received before he left the Yellowstone Park for St. Louis a long statement of what had been discovered by Mr. Bristow. There is reason to believe that the action taken to-day was in compliance with the President's judgment in the situation.

The action of the Postmaster General was taken ostensibly on the written recommendation of Mr. Bristow, who is directing the investigation of the affairs of the department, that the transfer of Mr. Machen's bureau to his jurisdiction and its administration by a Post Office Inspector would expedite the investigation. In ordering the change recommended, the Postmaster General gave Mr. Machen "leave of absence until the investigation is concluded." Mr. Machen promptly acquiesced in the decision of the Postmaster General, taking occasion to say in doing so that he courted the fullest investigation of his official conduct.

A prominent official in the department, who is regarded as having the President's confidence in the present condition of affairs, said yesterday that Machen would be suspended soon. By the same official the statement is made that there has come to the knowledge of that department alleged transactions between Machen and a member of the Corbin Lock Company, in which it is claimed that a large sum was either paid by the member of the company or offered by him to Machen. This matter is under inquiry, and has been related to the President.

Whether it will be laid before the Postmaster General in a way to convince him that it should be investigated is not known. It is understood that the official of the lock company is not inclined to talk about the affair because he is liable to prosecution for bribing a public official. This is the story that is told as having been instrumental in the summary action taken to-day by Mr. Payne in Mr. Machen's case.

Mr. Machen has been under fire ever since the investigation began. Charges of various kinds have been preferred against the administration of the free delivery branch of the postal service. These included allegations of collusion with letter box manufacturers in the furnishing of boxes to Post Office patrons, particularly on rural mail routes, the furnishing of advance information regarding the selection of routes, and the appointments of carriers, &c.

There also has been a conflict between Mr. Machen and First Assistant Postmaster General Wynne ever since the latter assumed office. Mr. Wynne charges Mr. Machen with insubordination. The strained relations between the head of the free delivery service and other officials resulted in an embarrassing state of affairs, and for several months correspondence between the Chief Superintendent of the Free Delivery Service and his immediate superior, the First Assistant Postmaster General, has been conducted, on the part of the former, through one of his subordinates.

Mr. Bristow all along has been of opinion that the interests of the service would be served by the relief of Mr. Machen, and has pointed out to the Postmaster General that that action was imperatively necessary to the successful conduct of the investigation.

THE OFFICIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

Late this afternoon, before a large number of newspaper men, Postmaster General Payne announced his decision and read the correspondence between himself and Mr. Machen, together with the recommendation of Mr. Bristow. The latter's recommendation, made under date of yesterday, which was practically a renewal of his previous recommendation and was made with the knowledge that it would be approved in this instance, was as follows:

In order to complete the departmental investigation now in progress in a more expeditious and satisfactory manner, I beg to request that the division of free delivery be temporarily assigned to the bureau of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, and that I be authorized to assign a Post Office Inspector as the acting general superintendent of said division during the continuance of this investigation.

The letter of the Postmaster General to Mr. Machen was as follows:

I am in receipt of a request from Gen. Bristow, Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, that the division of free delivery be temporarily assigned to his bureau, and that he be authorized to assign a Post Office Inspector as the acting general Superintendent of the division during the continuance of the investigation now in progress.

In conformity with this request, I have issued the following order, to take effect at the commencement of business on the 9th instant:

"The division of free delivery heretofore under the general supervision of the First Assistant Postmaster General, is hereby transferred and assigned to the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, and the regulations of the department are amended in conformity therewith."

You are hereby granted leave of absence until the investigation is concluded, and will turn over the division of free delivery to the control of M. C. Fosnes, Post Office Inspector, who has been designated as the Acting General Superintendent of the free delivery system.

Following was Mr. Machen's reply:

I am in receipt of your letter of this date, advising me of your order, to take effect on the 9th instant, transferring the division of free delivery from the supervision of the First Assistant Postmaster General to that of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General. I also note that I have been granted a leave of absence until the investigation now in progress is concluded, and that, during my absence Mr. M. C. Fosnes, Post Office Inspector, will be Acting General Superintendent of the free delivery service. In conformity with your instructions I will turn the department division over to Mr. Fosnes to-morrow morning. In this connection I desire to state what I have said to you heretofore, that I court the fullest investigation of my official conduct, and stand ready at any time to aid in the investigation now in progress, as I am conscious of having done no wrong.

Postmaster General Payne, in discussing the matter, said he believed the correspondence told the whole story. He said his conclusion to relieve Mr. Machen was reached yesterday after office hours. Mr. Bristow, he said, had come to his office and they had had a conference, during which Mr. Bristow presented his letter requesting to be put into full control of the office as a necessary step to expedite the investigation. He said there was nothing back of the change except what appeared in the letters themselves. He declined to say whether the changes made would be permanent, saying that that depended on the results of the investigation.

MACHEN AND HIS SUCCESSOR.

Mr. Machen came here from Toledo, Ohio, in 1893 and qualified as Superintendent of the free delivery service May 6 of that year. Since then the office has grown to immense proportions, and the rural free delivery mail service has been introduced and extended to cover all parts of the country.

Mr. Fosnes is one of the best-known Inspectors in the service. He is chief assistant of Mr. Bristow in the investigation. He is a native of Norway, where he was born in 1851, and his home is in Des Moines, Iowa. He was once a special examiner of the Pension Bureau, and subsequently served as Post Office Inspector at Philadelphia, Chicago, Helena, Mon., and St. Paul. He is still Post Office Inspector in charge of the St. Paul division. He is best known in connection with his investigation of the postal frauds in Cuba. On the dismissal of Estes G. Rathbone Mr. Fosnes was appointed Director General of Posts of Cuba, assuming that office June 23, 1900, and holding it until May 20, 1902, when the United States' sovereignty on the island ceased.

Ex-Representative Loud of California, who was Chairman of the House Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, has spent much time during the past two or three days in conference with Postmaster General Payne, First Assistant Postmaster General Wynne, and Fourth Assistant Postmaster General Bristow. Mr. Loud and Mr. Machen have been at odds officially for nearly two years, and it is believed that the counsel of Mr. Loud has figured in to-day's developments.

Mr. Machen had a conference with the Postmaster General to-day, and immediately after their talk, as had been arranged, Mr. Payne sent his letter to him. Mr. Machen to-night was not inclined to talk, but expressed confidence that he could rebut allegations made against him. He said:

I have no fear of not being able to meet any and all of the charges that have been under investigation for the last seven weeks. I take the action of the department to be a step toward expediting and closing up the investigation as promptly as possible, and designed to give Mr. Bristow an opportunity of getting a thorough insight into the free delivery service."

Mr. Machen will be at the department to-morrow morning to relinquish his office to Mr. Fosnes. He says that, except while removing his family to his Summer home at Westminster, Md., he will remain in this city during his leave of absence.

BIG STRIKE IN PENNSYLVANIA.

Construction Work in Western Part of State Will Be Stopped as Result of Quarrel Between Unions.

PITTSBURG, May 8.—All the union bricklayers in Western Pennsylvania, the members of the International Stone Union, the members of the National Association of Brick and Tile Makers of America, their helpers, and the clay miners and their helpers, all of whom are affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, will quit work at noon to-morrow. Fully 50,000 men will be idle until a settlement is effected, and all construction work in Western Pennsylvania will be stopped. The strike was decided on to-night at a mass meeting of the bricklayers and the stone masons.

The contention dates back to June 1, 1901, when dissension arose among the members of the International Stone Union, resulting in a division. The faction leaving the International Union organized the National Stone Masons' Union, and since that time the two associations have been at loggerheads. The animosity has increased in intensity until the stonemasons of one union would not work with the members of the other. In order that the bricklayers should not get into trouble a meeting was held to devise a plan to settle the contention. After three hours' discussion a resolution was passed that the members of the seceding organization enter into the International Union and that all bricklayers refuse to work until the contractors agree to engage none but members of the original organization.

The members of the National Association of Brick and Tile Makers of America and their helpers and the clay miners and their helpers will quit work to-morrow because the Harbison-Walker Refractories Company officials refuse to discuss the grievances the men presented to the company yesterday. The company will treat with individuals but not with representatives of labor unions.

STRIKERS KILL A WORKMAN.

VINELAND, N. J., May 8.—An Italian said to be Frank Capella was shot and killed at Minotola to-night. The man had been working in the Jonas Glass Works here, and on his way from the factory to his home he encountered a band of pickets about a mile from the works. A strike has been in progress among the employes of the glass works since last Summer, and the pickets have been trying to get the men now employed there to join them.

According to the story of the pickets, there was a quarrel between the Italian and some of their men, with the result that shots were exchanged. The Italian's body was allowed to remain where it fell and it is now in the open field, awaiting the arrival of Coroner Benson of Folsom. It is said there was another Italian with the dead man, but that he escaped, although he was also shot. A party is now searching in the woods for him.

Justice Sims has arrested several of the pickets.

HELD UP IN FIFTH AVENUE.

Frederick W. Downes, a broker, with offices at 25 Broad Street, was held up, he charges, by two women in Fifth Avenue last night.

He had been at the Hotel Manhattan and was walking down the avenue to Thirty-fourth Street to take a car, when, he says, at Thirty-sixth Street, one woman suddenly crowded in front of him and made a grab for his pocket, in which he had $200. She took the money and passed it to the other woman, Downes says. He seized them both before they could run away, and as he did so the woman who had his money threw it in the street, where it scattered.

Downes loosed his grasp on the women and tried to collect his money. Policeman Rensselaer of the West Thirtieth Street station arrived in time to hold the women. Downes thought he had picked up most of his money, but investigation showed that he had only $75. Two hundred-dollar and two ten-dollar bills were missing and were not found.

The women were taken to the Tenderloin station. They said they were Funny Wilson of 223 West Thirty-eighth Street and Mamie Doyle of the same address. Downes says the Doyle woman is the one who took his money. They were searched, but the missing money was not found in their possession.

To Change the Name of Hudson Bay.

Special to The New York Times.

OTTAWA, Ontario, May 8.—W. F. Maclean is the author of a bill in the House of Commons to change the name of Hudson Bay to the Canadian Sea. The reason assigned for the change is to conserve the control of the bay by removing any idea that it is not inland water over which Canada would naturally have jurisdiction. It is, in fact, almost surrounded by Canadian territory. Hudson Strait, is, however, to retain its name.

THREATENING MOVE BY RUSSIA IN MANCHURIA

Niu-Chwang Reoccupied and Forts Being Constructed.

14,000 Troops Between the Mouth of the Liau River and Port Arthur—Report That Great Stores of War Materials Are Being Accumulated.

PEKING, May 8.—The Russians have reoccupied Niu-Chwang with a large force, and have also put garrisons in the forts at the mouth of the Liau River. They are further reported to be making extensive warlike preparations.

On their return to Niu-Chwang the Russian troops brought with them several large guns.

A large force has been ordered to reoccupy Tien-Chwang-Tai. The Russians have 14,000 troops between the mouth of the Liau River and Port Arthur.

The Russians are reported to be constructing forts on the hills near Liau-Yung, commanding the road between there and the Yalu River, and they have arranged to have a large quantity of provisions delivered at Niu-Chwang.

The news of Russian activity comes from a most trustworthy source at Niu-Chwang. The Russian coup has caused profound surprise here, as recent developments had led to the expectation that Russia would compromise her demands, since they had been revealed to the powers.

The latest manoeuvre is interpreted as being intended as a reply to China's refusal to grant Russia's demands, and to the protest of the powers, and as a declaration that Russia is ready to fight in order to maintain possession of Manchuria. It is considered significant that the Russian troops reoccupied certain strategical posts at just about the time naval reinforcements were reaching the Gulf of Pe-chi-li. The temporary withdrawal of the Russian troops from Niu-Chwang is believed to have been a feint to avert suspicion from the contemplated policy until the Russian squadron was within useful distance.

It has been reported recently that Russia was accumulating great stores of provisions and war materials. It is impossible to confirm these reports, but it is known that the Russian military authorities have been buying many horses. All the available information indicates that Russia is preparing to increase and not decrease her forces in Manchuria.

The foreign Ministers yesterday discussed information to the effect that the Russians had taken a large tract of land across the river from Neu-Chwang and commanding the terminus of the Sh the negotiations she is preparing for all contingencies, storing supplies of coal and foodstuffs to a degree which is exciting attention.

At Niu-Chwang, adds the correspondent, the revenues of the port are still flowing into the Russo-Chinese Bank, which finds their possession a powerful lever for influencing the Chinese.

By The Associated Press.

WASHINGTON, May 8.—Accompanying the news of the reoccupation of Niu-Chwang by Russia comes a warning from the United States agents in China that the Russian attitude is injuring the chances of the commercial treaty with China, involving the opening to foreign trade of two cities in Manchuria.

The latest advices are that the treaty is already practically lost, owing to Russian opposition.

This fact is construed as giving the United States Government a direct interest in what is happening in Manchuria.

JOINT PROTEST CONTEMPLATED.

America, Britain, and Japan May Take Vigorous Action—State Department's Patience Taxed.

WASHINGTON, May 8.—The State Department has received official confirmation from its agents in China of the increase of the Russian garrison in Niu-Chwang, and there is reason to believe, if President Roosevelt approves, that it will take vigorous steps in the matter.

It is stated that the department has had its patience taxed by the course of events in Manchuria, and that it now contemplates a more radical step than any which has heretofore marked the negotiations between the powers on this subject. The proposed step contemplates joint action by Japan, Great Britain, and the United States. Preceding negotiations have been hampered by the inability of the United States to act jointly with other nations without violating its traditions, but it is now hinted that some plan of co-operation with England and Japan may be devised which will have the effect of convincing the Russian Government of the united determination of the three nations to insist upon Russia's evacuation of Manchuria, while not actually committing the United States to a formal alliance.

This programme is subject to the approval of the President. If it is not looked upon with favor by him the State Department may fall back upon its former method of individual representation to Russia and ask another explanation of the happenings in Manchuria. In such event the Russian answer is already forecasted by the officials here.

Under the Russian representation to the powers, the troops were to have been withdrawn from Niu-Chwang just one month ago to-day. It is understood as a matter of fact that some portion of the Russian force was withdrawn from the barracks in the city to tents outside. It is presumed from the Peking advices that these troops have now returned to the city. It is pointed out that Russia employed a saving clause in the promise to withdraw from Manchuria, the language being, "provided, however, that the action of other powers shall not stand in the way." Russia, it is understood, now claims that this proviso was violated by Japan when she mobilized her fleet and otherwise showed signs of military preparation which were construed as a menace to Russia.

Baron von Sternburg, the German Minister, and Sir Michael Herbert, the British Ambassador, both called at the State Department to-day. It is believed that their visits were in some degree connected with the Manchurian situation.

LONDON, May 9.—The papers this morning warmly welcome the prospect of the United States initiating joint action with Great Britain and Japan against the designs of Russia in Manchuria. They believe that such concerted action would induce Russia to beat a prudent retreat.

The Standard says:

"The only fault that can be found with the diplomacy of the United States in the Far East has been its excessive caution and reluctance to co-operate with the European powers. Now, however, that Russia has dropped the mask, Washington's forbearance is exhausted, and if the United States has the will it has the power to enforce its views on the sanctity of the treaties."

The Morning Post thinks it would be prudent to wait until President Roosevelt has made his decision known, and comments upon the momentous effects of such a disturbance of the balance of power in the Far East as the intervention of the United States would involve.

JAPANESE PARTIES AGREE.

Marquis Ito Makes an Arrangement with the Ministry as to the Naval Programme.

London Times—New York Times Special Cablegram.

LONDON, May 9.—At a general meeting of the Seiyu-Kai, says the Tokio correspondent of The Times, the Marquis Ito declared that there was nothing more injurious to national interests than frequent changes of Ministry, of which the average in Japan had been one annually since the Chinese-Japanese war. Therefore, while making no sacrifice of his political views, he had lent his aid to effect an entente on the basis of preserving the naval programme without recourse to increased taxation of any kind. This arrangement, however, was purely personal, and would not affect the freedom of the Legislature or the Executive.

The speech was excellently received, and even the extremists refrained from pressing a proposal to hold the Cabinet responsible for a dissolution. There is, therefore, says the correspondent, every prospect of a quiet session. The co-operation between the Seiyu-Kai and the Progressists is now ended.

The recent political crisis in Japan was watched with interest by statesmen all over the world, because of its possible effect on the British-Japanese alliance.

The trouble arose over the plans for a great increase in Japan's navy. That the fleet was to be largely strengthened was a proposal to which all the political parties in the empire agreed; the dispute was in regard to the measures for providing money for the new ships.

The Government proposed to increase the land tax, and this was bitterly opposed, it being claimed by the Opposition parties that a policy of retrenchment would provide the necessary funds.

KING EDWARD TO VISIT RUSSIA.

It Is Believed That He Will Go There Next Month.

Special Cable to The New York Times.

LONDON, May 9.—The sensational reports current in regard to the possibility of war between Great Britain and Russia are discredited in well-informed circles in London, since it is known that King Edward contemplates an early visit to his nephew the Czar.

His Majesty's yacht has been ordered to be ready for a fresh cruise on June 20, and the vessel will probably go up the Baltic, calling at Kiel as well as Kronstadt and Copenhagen.

RUSSIAN CONSULATE AT MUKDEN.

PEKING, May 9.—The Russians have established a Consulate at Mukden.

One of the seven Russian demands regarding Manchuria was that no new Consulates should be established and no more treaty ports opened in that territory.

This, according to the Peking correspondent of The London Times, was "a slap in the face" for the United States, which pressed, in negotiations for the American-Chinese commercial treaty, that Mukden and Taku-Shan should be opened to foreign trade.

RUSSIAN TROOPS IN KOREA?

Persistent Reports to That Effect in Japan—Large Force Said to be Approaching Wiju.

YOKOHAMA, May 8.—There are persistent reports in circulation regarding the movements of Russian troops along the Yalu River.

Detachments have, it is said, entered Korea ostensibly to protect the Russian timber concessionaires, and a large body of Russian troops is reported to be approaching Wiju, Korea.

MAYOR IN YIDDISH THEATRE.

Mayor Low attended in the Windsor Theatre last evening the benefit performance for the relief of Jewish people of Kishenev, and in a brief address expressed his sympathy for the suffering people. He had an enthusiastic audience, being cheered almost constantly from the time he arrived at the theatre until he left, just before midnight.

The play's title is "The Rioting in Kishenev," and it depicts the suffering of the Jews, putting stress upon the persecutions. It was written in three days by Prof. Hurowitz.

At the close of the third act N. Durshkind introduced Mayor Low to the audience. For fully five minutes the Mayor was unable to speak. The audience cheered and the orchestra played "The Star-Spangled Banner."

"After the splendid acting I have witnessed," the Mayor said, "I am happy to think that the Jews and Christians are able to live happily together as citizens of one great city. In New York there are many languages, but only one kind of citizens. The great poet Shakespeare says 'One touch of nature makes the whole world kin' and when the tidings came from Russia I felt a genuine sympathy and fellow-feeling for you. I am here without race or creed considered, and I honor you for your show of sympathy. I thank you for this warm and hearty greeting, and with all my heart I wish your cause well."

Mr. Durshkind made a short speech, and Dr. Radin spoke words of encouragement for the relief work. The theatre was crowded, and besides the receipts at the door, money was collected from those in the audience by nine young women who passed baskets. Every one was supplied with a subscription envelope on entering. It was said that the door receipts amounted to more than $1,000. Five performances are to be given.

ARBOR DAY CELEBRATED.

Arbor Day was held yesterday, and it was celebrated in all the public schools in the city by an hour devoted to botanical and horticultural study, by recitations, addresses by the Principals, and, where feasible, the planting of a tree. Even in the closest tenement regions trees supplied by the American Tree Planting Association were planted in big wooden boxes. The children very generally carried flowers when they went to school, and the teachers received many pretty bouquets as gifts.

At the old Bloomingdale School, or Public School 9, according to official records, at West End Avenue and Eighty-second Street, about 1,000 children joined in planting a tree in a plot before the building. Other schools did their planting in the parks. There was a tree-planting and flag-raising at the Home for the Friendless, Woodycrest Avenue, near One Hundred and Sixty-first Street, the flag being the gift of Alexander Post, No. 182, G. A. R., which attended with its Women's Relief Corps.

Public School No. 75 planted a tree in William H. Seward Park, while School No. 113 held a flower show. There was a tree planting at the Jacobi A. Riis Neighborhood Settlement, 49 and 50 Henry Street, the annual reception of the institution being held at the same time, with Mr. and Mrs. Riis present.

The Tree Planting Association planted trees in many widely separated parts of the city where the shade will be most needed.

ASKED $500,000, GOT $12,500.

Jury's Verdict for Boy Injured in the Park Avenue Tunnel Disaster.

After suing twice in the Supreme Court to recover $500,000 from the New York Central Railroad for injuries suffered by his eighteen-year-old son, Everett Coffin, in the Park Avenue tunnel disaster on Jan. 2, 1902, the jury before Justice Amend yesterday returned a verdict of $12,500 in favor of Walter C. Coffin of New Rochelle.

Young Coffin had both legs crushed, three ribs broken, and received other injuries which developed pneumonia. He has hobbled into court on a cane, and it was declared by his counsel, Albert Stickney, that his injuries would permanently incapacitate him from work. Austen G. Fox, who represented the railroad, brought out the fact that the young man had walked two miles without a cane, had pulled a boat with his father, and had been sliding on the ice since his partial recovery.

The first trial resulted in a mistrial, owing to the illness of Mr. Stickney. When that trial came to an end the railroad company offered Coffin $15,000 and actually had advanced $5,000 on account, but the offer of full settlement was declined and another trial insisted upon.

It was said last night that the claim against the New York Central Railroad was for both compensative and punitive damages. It being alleged that the Directors of the road were criminally negligent in not furnishing proper signals in the tunnel. The setting forth that the punitive damages could not be allowed was proof, it was held, that there was no fault with the signal service. Otherwise the road might have been forced to tear out its whole system and use some other.

POOLROOM MEN PLEAD GUILTY.

Seven in Brooklyn Paroled Pending Sentence—More Indictments.

Seven men pleaded guilty in the County Court, Brooklyn, yesterday to the charge of keeping gambling establishments. All of the men had been indicted for selling pools on the races, which is a felony, but were permitted to plead to the other charge, which, under the Penal Code, is a misdemeanor.

The men were paroled in the custody of their lawyers and will be arraigned for sentence on Monday. They are William Stringer of 181 Jefferson Avenue, Louis J. Schmidt of 912 Flushing Avenue, Thomas Ryan of 46 Flushing Avenue, Thomas Harding of 600 Bedford Avenue, Daniel L. Lahey and Daniel Lahey of 600 Bedford Avenue, and Joseph E. Patterson of 708 Sackett Street.

Hanged Himself in a Cell.

While under arrest for disorderly conduct on Friday night Richard Zeller of 585 Eagle Avenue, the Bronx, committed suicide in his cell by hanging, using his suspenders for the purpose. Patrolman William T. Baumbach of the East One Hundred and Fourth Street Station had seen the man, who was apparently under the influence of liquor, accosting every person who passed, and more to keep him out of harm's way than anything else arrested him and took him to the Morrisania Police Station.

Lost Life to Save His Pipe.

While standing near the bulkhead of Pier 24 East River last night Henry Smith, sixty-three years old, a watchman, dropped his pipe. It fell on the stringpiece of the dock, and in reaching for it Smith lost his balance and fell into the river. He was seen to fall, but was drowned before help could reach him. The body was recovered.

Col. Dady for Mayor Low.

Col. Michael J. Dady, just back from Cuba, announced yesterday that he is "for Low, first, last, and all the time," and expects to see him re-

HORSE MAKES HIGH JUMP

R. Donnelly's Rifle Establishes Club Record in Brooklyn Show.

A. G. Vanderbilt Thrown from His Polo Pony, but He Wins the Blue Ribbon—Women Win Prizes.

Alfred G. Vanderbilt was thrown from his horse last night at the Horse Show of the Brooklyn Riding and Driving Club. The accident happened at the conclusion of a riding off exhibit in the class for polo ponies. Mr. Vanderbilt and Clarence H. Robbins were showing the merits of their horses, Oakland and Little Billie.

Both men came flying down the tanbark with honors about even. Vanderbilt then attempted to turn his horse off, but ran in too close to the side. He was scraped from Oakland's back, and thrown to the ground. He pluckily held the horse, however, and remounted without assistance. A moment later he lost his stirrup.

Despite these drawbacks, the showing made by Vanderbilt and his bay gelding was very good. Vanderbilt's horsemanship was applauded and the blue ribbon was awarded to Oakland, the horse that caused all the trouble. Vanderbilt exhibited two horses in this class and he rode both of them. Little Billie carried off the red ribbon and Happy Days, ridden by Morton W. Smith, won the third prize.

The performance of the bay gelding Rifle was the most sensational of the night. This horse managed to clear the bars at a height of 7 feet 1 inch, thereby establishing a new jumping record for the Riding and Driving Club. To-morrow night Rifle will attempt to better the world's record of 7 feet 8 inches, held by Heatherbloom, the incentive being a prize of $300 offered by the club. In his performance last night Rifle was ridden by his exhibitor, Richard Donnelly. Heatherbloom was to have competed in the same class, but he was withdrawn owing to lameness.

Nearly all the women who had horses in last night's competitions exhibited them. The showing made by Mrs. John Gerken and her chestnut gelding Newsboy in the contest for the Lawson Cup won for horse and driver well-merited applause. Mrs. Gerken's horse, driven to a gig, lost nothing by her handling of the reins. This is the second time that Newsboy has won in this class. To obtain possession of the cup it is necessary to win it three times.

Miss May Doering's superb handling of her gray mare Natalie in the class for saddle horses over fourteen hands one inch and under fifteen hands two inches, had much to do with the winning of the blue ribbon. Miss Ella F. Knowlton's entry in this class, the chestnut gelding Carrots, was ridden by Miss Whiting. She also showed her horse to advantage and won second prize.

Twelve entries in the class for saddle horses of fifteen hands two inches or more made the judging exceedingly hard. Two of the horses were ridden by women, but neither secured a prize. The chestnut gelding Rob Roy, exhibited by Mrs. Harriet G. Marshall, and ridden by W. A. McGibbon, was finally adjudged to be the best. Zapernick and Sporting Dutchess won the other prizes, the red ribbon going to the former. Summary:

Saddle Horses, over 14.1 hands and under 15.2 hands.—Won by Miss May Doering's b. m. Natalie; Miss Ella F. Knowlton's ch. g. Carrots, second; Mrs. Charles F. Hubb's gr. g. Cinders, third.

RELIANCE OFF FOR BRISTOL.

GLEN COVE, L. I., May 8.—The Reliance and Columbia left their moorings shortly after 10 o'clock this morning, the Reliance from New Rochelle and the Columbia from Glen Cove. The Reliance got a gentle wind from the southeast and slowly started off to the Sound, and then hove off to the eastward, bound for Bristol to get a new suit of sails and to be refitted. Her tender, the Sunbeam, went off ahead of her. The Columbia lay becalmed for more than one-half hour at Glen Cove, and was then towed into the Sound by her tender, the Park City. It was evidently the purpose of Mr. Morgan to have a brush with the new boat.

The Columbia's tender left when she was a mile astern of the new boat. Both were nearly becalmed at 11:15 A. M.

The Reliance soon afterward got a light air from the southeast and went off to the eastward at a seven-knot clip. The breeze was steady, with the Reliance for three-quarters of an hour, when the Columbia had sailed about five miles. Capt. Miller of the older boat changed the sign of his jibtopsail four different times in a vain effort to catch the fickle breeze. Meantime the Reliance drew steadily away from the Columbia, and at noon had increased her lead by about two miles, and was then nearly three miles ahead of the Columbia, sailing in a very much better breeze than the older boat could find. Capt. Miller of the Columbia then gave up the chase, put about, and ran back toward Glen Cove. The Reliance kept on to the eastward.

BRISTOL, R. I., May 8.—Preparations have been made at the Herreshoff works to receive the yacht Reliance, which to-day left New Rochelle. She is to be hauled out without delay to have her under body cleaned and polished for the races at Glen Cove, beginning on May 21.

The topmast of the Constitution was changed to-day. The riggers sent the old topmast to the deck by means of a jury topmast and tackle, and the new spar was sent aloft to take its place. The new spar is two feet longer than the old one, measuring 60 feet.

SHAMROCK III. IN GOOD SHAPE.

New Boom Stronger Than the Old One—Ready for Trial Race To-day.

GOUROCK, Scotland, May 8.—The weather to-day was well suited for racing. In the afternoon Capt. Wringe, anxious to give the challenger's sails a stretching before to-morrow's set race, went out with her alone. The yacht made a couple of trips from Gourock to Holy Loch and return, and negotiated a slight sea well, in a fresh breeze, standing up excellently under her canvas. The new boom stood the strain admirably and showed no sign of weakness. The new boom is stronger and stiffer than the old one; but it is not heavier, as aluminium fittings were used instead of the steel fittings employed on the old boom.

The course for to-morrow's race has been measured and laid off from Gourock.

Columbia Crews Row To-day.

Columbia's new boathouse, on the Harlem River, will be formally opened this afternoon by a regatta among the college oarsmen. The first, second, and third 'Varsity crews, a graduate crew, three freshman crews, a graduate crew, and 1903, 1904, and 1905 class crews will be entered. The course will be the regular three-mile event from Washington Bridge to the boathouse. A tug has been chartered to follow the races.

Threaten to Burn Boathouses.

Members of the Varuna Boat Club of Brooklyn are alarmed on account of the receipt of an anonymous letter stating that the boathouse of the club, at Sheepshead Bay, has been a nuisance and that the new house, now being built at a cost of $10,000, will be burned as soon as it is completed. The club has been burned out three times within little more than as many years, and it is believed that all the fires have been of incendiary origin. The police of the Sheepshead Bay Station are investigating the matter.

MGR. KAIN TO CEASE WORK.

Archbishop at St. Louis Will Enter a Sanitarium and May Never Return to His See.

Special to The New York Times.

ST. LOUIS, May 8.—Archbishop J. J. Kain will leave next Monday for Baltimore, where he will undergo treatment in a sanitarium. He has informed his close friends here that he may never come back, and those who are acquainted with the exact state of his health take this view.

Bishop J. J. Glennon of Kansas City will arrive here to-morrow and assume the active duties of the archdiocese. Archbishop Kain will practically sever all connection with his work here. He succeeded Archbishop Kenrick in 1894, and has made a successful prelate.

Several months ago he was stricken with partial paralysis, and his condition has not improved since. He was educated in Baltimore, and came to St. Louis in 1868. Where he was one of the leaders in the Catholic hierarchy of this country.

HURT BY DYNAMITE.

Special to The New York Times.

MORRISTOWN, N. J., May 8.—Thomas Angus of Stanhope has found out to his sorrow that a charge of dynamite may be effective a year after the placing in position, but in making the discovery he was injured, and he will probably lose the sight of both eyes.

A year ago he was blasting stone for a new building, and one charge of dynamite which he placed failed to explode. As he had enough stone for the work on which he was engaged he did not bother to dig it out, and forgot about it later. He went to the rock pit yesterday to get more stone, and seeing the old boulder, struck it with his hammer, saying: "I wonder if the old charge is still alive."

The next instant there was an explosion, and he was hurled fifty feet away. When picked up by other workmen he was unconscious. He was carried to his home, where Dr. Henry Neldon attended him. His right arm was shattered, and it may have to be amputated. He is also internally injured.

The Romance Seminar also received from the same source a series of portraits of a number of Italian scholars of the period of the Renaissance and Italian humanists. There is also a fine edition of Dante of 1491, in an admirable state of preservation, bound in parchment.

POLICEMAN SAVED TWO

Shields Rescued Them from the East River.

John Montgomery and His Would-Be Rescuer Nearly Lost When the Policeman Reached Them.

Heroic incidents followed fast when John Montgomery, forty years old, and powerfully built, living at the Olive Tree Inn, in East Twenty-third Street, was seized with vertigo on the East Twenty-first Street pier, at 8:30 o'clock yesterday morning and fell overboard. He had no sooner risen to the surface than Thomas Hartin of 326 East Forty-ninth Street leaped after him.

Montgomery threw his arms about the neck of his rescuer and tried to draw himself up on his shoulders. Hartin fought him furiously and shouted for help, but his head was rapidly being forced beneath the surface. At that moment Policeman Shields of the East Thirty-fifth Street Station was running at top speed down the pier. Throwing belt and helmet from him as he reached the brink, he plunged straight in the direction of the fast drowning men. He grabbed Hartin just as Montgomery began to lose consciousness. It was Hartin's turn then to hold him, and he and Shields started back to the pier, but it was the policeman's muscles that accounted for most of their progress.

A small crowd had gathered by this time. As they came close to the piles the braver of those above them lowered themselves over the stringpiece and were held fast by others in a human chain. Montgomery's barely animate form was passed up from the water, and then Hartin and Shields were rescued in the same manner. Montgomery was the only one who had to go to the hospital, and he was sent to Bellevue, close at hand.

CAUSE OF RICH MAN'S DEATH.

Relatives of William Weisel Start an Inquiry and Subpoenas Are Issued.

Circumstances in connection with the death and last will of aged William Weisel, who died in his boarding house, 444 Lexington Avenue, on April 9, leaving an estate valued at $300,000, led Samuel L. Ferguson, counsel for twelve nephews and nieces of the dead man, to obtain from Magistrate Crane, in the Yorkville Police Court, yesterday, three subpoenas as the first step in an investigation.

The subpoenas were addressed to Mrs. Flint, who conducts the Lexington Avenue house; A. Mandelbaum of 145 East Fifty-eighth Street, an undertaker, and Dr. J. B. McKenzie of 94 West One Hundred and Fourth Street. At least fourteen other witnesses will be called.

Mr. Ferguson says that the will was drawn by Louis Hess, a lawyer, of 271 Broadway, in December, 1901. Mr. Hess and his managing clerk, Samuel Lewis, being the witnesses. It had been kept in the lawyer's possession until after the death of the testator. Mr. Ferguson says that Morris Stern, husband of Mr. Weisel's niece, was made the executor, and that $50,000 is bequeathed to him. He is also a client of Mr. Hess. The will leaves, Mr. Ferguson says, to relatives of the testator by names that are not their proper names, and omits mention of others who had equal right to legacies with those mentioned.

Since the death, Mr. Ferguson said, seven different causes have been assigned for the death of Mr. Weisel. They are chronic Bright's disease, pleuro-pneumonia, heart failure, old age, hardening of the blood vessels, vertigo, and nervous prostration.

MRS. KEMP'S APPEAL.

Asks for Alimony Pending Suit for Separation—Husband Denies Charges of Cruelty.

The affairs of George Kemp and Mrs. Lilla Kemp, his wife, were before Justice O'Gorman in the Supreme Court yesterday on the argument of a motion for an order for alimony, pending the trial of Mrs. Kemp's suit for separation.

Counsel for Mrs. Kemp said that she charged her husband with misconduct and cruelty and that when they separated, in 1892, by mutual agreement Mrs. Kemp was allowed $3,000 a year, which amount since had been paid in monthly installments of $250 by the trustees of the estate of the late George Kemp, Sr. About two years ago the amount was reduced to $2,500 and a year ago payments were stopped entirely. Each of the two children of the marriage has an income of $2,500 a year under the provisions of their grandfather's will.

Counsel for Mr. Kemp opposed the motion on the ground that Mrs. Kemp had been paid more money during the past two years than if she had been in receipt of $3,000 alimony for each year of the period. In regard to the charges of cruelty, counsel declared that Mrs. Kemp had an ungovernable temper, and that on the last occasion when husband and wife met, about a year ago, in the office of the wife's attorney, Mrs. Kemp, in a fit of rage, picked up a heavy iron notary's seal and attempted to strike her husband with it.

The contention of the attorneys for Mrs. Kemp is that she should have at least half of the $9,000 annual income paid to Mr. Kemp from the estate of his father. Justice O'Gorman reserved his decision.

FLUSHING PUPILS' OFFENSE.

Limburger Cheese Smeared on Desks and Benches, and Piano Damaged in the High School.

Eight boy pupils of the Flushing High School were suspended yesterday because it is alleged they smeared the furniture in one of the rooms with limburger cheese. About a week ago entrance was forced into the school. Nothing was done except in Miss Blackwell's room, where the cheese was rubbed on desks, benches, piano, and floor. The smell the next day was so bad it was impossible to use the room, and the class had to be dismissed.

An investigation was made and it was ascertained that two students had purchased that kind of cheese at a delicatessen store not far from the school on the night the offense was committed. They were summoned before Principal John Holley Clark and made a confession, implicating the six other boys. Principal Clark refused to give the names of the offenders, who are said to have been prompted by a feeling of animosity toward Miss Blackwell.

The boys suspended are said to be members of this year's graduating class. Besides smearing the desks, they also damaged the assembly room piano by cutting the strings. The matter is to be referred to the District Board by Principal Clark, and it is said the pupils may be prosecuted in court. It is believed, however, that the parents of the boys will pay for having the piano repaired.

FIREMEN ACCUSED OF ARSON.

Said to Have Confessed They Fired a Barn So That Their Company Might Distinguish Itself.

On a warrant secured by Fire Marshal William L. Beers, William C. Friedel and Thomas Powers of Whitestone, Queens Borough, were arrested late last night, charged with arson in the second degree. Herbert Willmoth, Philip Hettrick, and George Dixon were arrested as accessories to the crime. All the young men are members of a hose company in Whitestone.

It is said they have confessed to setting fire to Haggerty's barn at Whitestone Landing on Tuesday night. It is alleged the confession was made to Fire Marshal Beers. Beers says they told him their object in setting fire to the barn was because they wanted their company to have the honor of reaching the fire first.

No News of George A. Kolb.

Excavators Vote to Stay Out Six Months if Necessary.

Contractor McDonald Prepared to Hire New Men on Monday and Trouble May Result.

At a meeting last night of the officers and delegates of the Rockmen's and Excavators' Union, held at the Free Society Hall, 208-210 East One Hundred and Thirteenth Street, it was decided by unanimous vote to prolong the strike for a period of six months or longer, if necessary, in order to obtain the demand they now make on the contractors.

President Tito Pacelli of the organization put the question of a six months' hold out to the representatives with a view to learning what his associates thought of such a lengthy strike. It was the sense of every delegate and officer present that six months would not be too long for the men to hold out. The Central Federated Union, by an appropriation, will partially support the strikers throughout the period of their idleness.

At the close of last night's meeting Mr. Pacelli said:

"I find the men as firm to-night as at any time since they went out. I have not seen Fort Warden James E. March within the past two days, and I do not think I shall see him again for some time to come. I cannot understand what Mr. March can do to aid us at present. He offered his services in our behalf, and I was obliged to accept his kind offer. However, I am not treating this matter as though I were a politician. I am not a politician, and I do not think that any political force can be brought to bear directly on our present trouble to settle it in a way that would be agreeable to my men.

"I met Mr. March at the suggestion of the Italian Consul, who on Tuesday night last sent me a telegraphic request to call on Mr. March at the latter's office."

The resolution approving of the six months' hold-out was agreed to by between fifty and sixty men, one-half of whom comprise the Presidents and Secretaries of the various branches. The officials form what is called the Second Board, which has full power to act on all measures for the strikers.

One of the officers, who attended last night's meeting, said that several wealthy Italians who are heartily in sympathy with the men have given assurance of financial support.

There will be several meetings to-day, the first at 4 o'clock this morning, the second at 4 o'clock this afternoon, and a third at 8 o'clock this evening. Each of these meetings will be held in the hall at 2,229 First Avenue. The President will attend.

There is no prospect of actual trouble because of the subway excavators' strike until Monday, but unless the Italians acquiesce in an arbitration agreement by that time the contractor, John B. McDonald, will begin to fill their places.

Mr. McDonald left the office of the Rapid Transit Subway Construction Company early in the day, but Secretary Frederick Dwight said that no attempt would be made to bring in outside laborers before Sunday's meeting.

Except in Upper Broadway, where a few foremen had failed to go out with the other Italians, there were no workmen visible in the rapid transit tunnel yesterday. These foremen were doing ordinary laborers' work and were the subject of some jeering from loitering strikers, who hooted at their former bosses from the pavements, but did not seem to desire to make trouble. Scattered policemen dispersed the strikers whenever they were found in groups.

The excavators who remained at their posts on jobs other than the tunnel were not attacked by the strikers, but in many places policemen were stationed to guard off any trouble. Thomas E. Crimmins, whose contracting interests include many jobs affected by the strike, visited the Bureau of Combustibles, at Fire Headquarters, during the day, and said he did not think the strike was ended, as he could see no sign of withdrawal on the part of the union men to yield. Mr. Crimmins had in his pocket the translation of an Italian circular sent to the unionists several weeks ago. It announced that May 1 "was a lucky day for our grand union" and was to make a successful attack on "cheating, fraud, and bossism." The circular was signed by "the Executive Committee," and referred to the union's "calumniators" as "reptiles."

THE POTTER STRIKE ENDED.

Amalgamated Carpenters Gain Victory and Will Go to Work on Apartment Houses.

At the meeting of the United Board of Building Trades held yesterday afternoon the first victory for the Amalgamated Society was scored in the ordering back of the men on the apartment buildings in Seventy-fourth Street, between Columbus Avenue and Central Park West, which are being erected by the wife of Bishop Potter.

It was over these apartments that the greatest difficulty arose, on the question whether the Amalgamated men should or should not be permitted to have a portion of the job. As a result of the meeting yesterday the Amalgamated men are to go back to the work which they left when the controversy arose.

It was said after the meeting that seven firms had signed an agreement to furnish all the lumber needed.

NINE STRIKERS FINED.

Special to The New York Times.

CINCINNATI, May 8.—Nine strikers at the Cincinnati Beveling and Silvering Company's plant, on Oliver Street, were fined by Judge Hosea in the Superior Court to-day for contempt of court. The court suspended the fines and sentences, however, on assurances that the defendants would not repeat their offense.

John Schumacher, John Hauser, George Saline, Charles Faber, Joseph Bomhorst, and D. Horrigan were fined $10 each, and William Cooper, F. W. Schwegman and Benjamin Schmitker were fined $25 each and sentenced to five days in jail.

Schwegman is Vice President and Cooper is Treasurer of the local union of the International Glass Workers' Amalgamated Union. They are alleged to have interfered against the order of the court, with men who took the places of the strikers. It is asserted that Schwegman, Cooper, and Schmitker were more energetic than the others.

IMPORTED LABORERS DESERT.

Of Fifteen Sent to Mount Vernon Eleven Run Away and Four Join Strikers.

MOUNT VERNON, N. Y., May 8.—T. E. Crimmins, the New York contractor, who is doing construction work on the Union Electric Railway here, and whose laborers are on strike, sent fifteen men from New York this morning to take the places of strikers. Most of the newcomers were negroes. Chief Foley and a dozen policemen were on the ground prepared to protect the men.

The strikers gathered in force, and eleven of the fifteen New York laborers became so frightened that they refused to work, and left here for New York on the next train. The foreman started the four remaining men at work paving between the tracks in Pine Street, near Scott. He asked for police protection and a detail of six men was sent to the place. The strikers made no attempt at violence. The four men worked all the morning, but after the noon hour they decided to quit, and joined the strikers. It is said they were not threatened, but acted voluntarily.

UNION SEEKS INJUNCTION.

Would Have Western Union Telegraph Company Restrained from Discharging Members.

ST. LOUIS, May 8.—The Commercial Telegraphers' Union of America to-day filed a petition in the United States District Court asking Judge Adams to issue an injunction to restrain the Western Union Telegraph Company from discharging men belonging to the union.

The petitioners also ask that the company be restrained from blacklisting members of the union and from interfering with them in any manner.

BOSTON AND MAINE REPORT.

Cost of Coal Made a Huge Difference in the Operating Expenses of the Road.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, May 8.—The statement of the Boston and Maine Railroad Company for the quarter ended March 31 shows gross earnings in that period were $7,804,097, an increase of $692,740. Operating expenses increased $757,726, however, and there was a decrease in net earnings of $72,562. For the nine months ended March 31 the net income decreased $106,485.

An explanatory paragraph states that operating expenses of this year included the temporary increase in the cost of fuel for the quarter of $620,208 and for the nine months of $900,200. Had it not been for the high cost of coal net earnings for the quarter ended March 31 would have shown an increase of $547,704 instead of a decrease, and for the nine months the increase would have been $793,775 in place of the decrease.

The surplus March 31 was $4,413,580, but there was a balance on the wrong side of the account for the quarter of $63,635. Interest, rentals, and taxes for the nine months ended March 31 amounted to $4,102,670, and dividends, $1,374,070, a total of $7,476,745. The total net income for the period was $7,257,508, showing a deficit of $219,237.

In other words, if fuel was to continue to cost as much as it has during the last nine months, dividends would undoubtedly have to be reduced. As the cost of fuel has pretty nearly reached its normal level, however, it is a question whether a cut in the dividend will be made.

The common stock sold at 200 in April of last year, fell to 160 in September, and has fallen since several times to 175. At this figure paying dividends of 7 per cent., it yields 4 per cent. on the investment.

COURTS AND MASONIC ORDER.

Accused Member Fails to Get Injunction to Restrain Commission in an Investigation.

Decision was rendered against Charles Franklin by Justice Gildersleeve in the Supreme Court yesterday in declining to grant an injunction to restrain the commission of Masons appointed by Grand Master Elbert Crandall from trying him on charges preferred by William D. Critcherson.

Mr. Franklin, a member of Excelsior Lodge and editor of an insurance publication, was charged with having libeled Frederick A. Burnham, President of the Mutual Reserve Life Insurance Company, also a member of the lodge, and he has been indicted twice. He sought to stop trial in his lodge before trial in the courts.

Justice Gildersleeve dissolved the preliminary injunction that was secured several weeks ago. In his decision the Justice said in part:

"So far as appears, the proceedings against him in the Masonic order are in strict accordance with the ordinary course of procedure by that body. It is the province of all courts, constituting the civil judiciary, to take cognisance only of those rights which flow from the common law, legislative enactments, political Constitutions, and international treaties. The right to Masonic fraternity springs from no one of these sources. Membership therein confers no legal right of which a court of equity will take cognisance."

LIBELED FOR $302,000.

Charge That the Saginaw Was Sunk by the Hamilton Through Negligence.

As a result of the sinking of the Clyde coastwise liner Saginaw May 5 off Hog Island, Md., the owners of the Old Dominion steamship Hamilton were yesterday notified of the libeling of that vessel for $302,000, it being alleged that the Saginaw was sunk through negligence on the part of those on board the Hamilton.

Robinson, Biddle & Ward, proctors in admiralty, represent the Clyde Steamship Company in the action, and the libel prepared by them complains that the Hamilton's whistle was not sounded, as provided by law; that the Hamilton did not proceed at a moderate rate of speed, as it customary in a fog; that it did not carry a competent look-out; that it did not back its engines seasonably, and that reasonable, timely, or seasonable precautions were not taken to prevent the collision.

Patient in Hospital Returns Home Because Animal Was Put Out.

Because the officials refused to admit a Newfoundland dog into St. Catharine's Hospital, Williamsburg, Mrs. Emma Gerlach of 301 Scholes Street refused to remain in the institution. She fell from a ladder in front of the house at 18 Cook Street while cleaning windows, and had her left elbow fractured. She was attended in her home, and later she went to the hospital accompanied by her dog.

The animal wandered into a ward in which were twenty patients and began to bark, frightening the patients. With considerable difficulty the dog was put out. When Mrs. Gerlach learned of that she immediately returned to her home.

GENERAL STAFF INSTRUCTED.

Secretary Root Orders the New Army Board to Begin Work at Once.

WASHINGTON, May 8.—Secretary Root to-day, in a memorandum to Gen. Corbin, gave directions to the General Staff to begin work at once. The Secretary says:

"The officers named in general orders announcing the personnel of the General Staff, other than general officers, together with the Adjutant General of the Army and the members of the War College Board, are constituted a board to consider and report a scheme of organization of the General Staff; to consider and report such amendments of the army regulations as may be requisite and useful, to determine the relations between the General Staff and the administrative staff departments and to regulate the general conduct of business in the War Department after the inauguration of the General Staff, and to consider and report upon such other matters as shall be referred to them from time to time prior to the 15th of August, 1903."

PHILIPPINES OFFICE DECLINED.

Dr. Hollander Will Not Accept the Monetary Commissionership.

Special to The New York Times.

BALTIMORE, May 8.—Dr. Jacob H. Hollander, professor of economics in Johns Hopkins University, has declined the appointment by the Government as special United States Commissioner to the Philippines for supervising the establishment of the gold standard currency system there.

Secretary Root summoned Dr. Hollander a week ago and offered him the appointment. It was reluctantly declined on account of Dr. Hollander's connection at Johns Hopkins. When Dr. Hollander returned from Porto Rico, after a successful term as Special Commissioner and Treasurer of the island, it was rumored that he would be offered the Treasurership of the Philippines.

Dr. Hollander to-day declined to discuss his personal connection with the matter, but talked of its general aspects.

"The last session of Congress," he said, "provided for the introduction of the gold standard into the Philippines, and the coin has already been struck. This is to replace, in large measure, the Mexican currency now in circulation throughout the archipelago.

"The problem is to introduce the new currency and maintain the new standard at a parity with gold. The peso is to be of the gold value of 50 cents in our money. It is proposed to fix this value by issuing limited amounts. Gold exchange is to be sold for the accommodation of commercial enterprises, and the ultimate intention is to give gold in exchange. It is here that the most delicate part of the problem lies."

The annual statement of the Vulcan Detinning Company, which has just been issued to stockholders, shows that after the payment of the dividends on the preferred and common stocks, amounting to $185,000, writing off $16,388.72 for depreciation and setting aside $6,551.22 as a special reserve fund, there are carried over undivided profits of $34,234.14.

SEEK TO SETTLE LOCK-OUT

Contractors Are Not Pressing for Delivery of Material—Bricklayers in Dead-Lock.

Meetings of the Lumber Dealers' Association and the Building Material Dealers' Association were held all yesterday at 18 Broadway. The Labor Committee of the lumber dealers said that the shut-down in the yards was just as complete as ever, with the exception of the firms which had been mentioned before and whose yards are still open. The shut-down in the building material yards was said to be complete. City, State, and Federal work, as well as subway construction, will not be included in the shut-down in the lumber yards.

Contractors and builders who were seen yesterday said they would take no action at present. A. J. Robinson of the A. J. Robinson Company, which has a great many contracts for large buildings throughout the city, said:

"We are not rushing matters in the delivery of building material. We realise that the building material dealers and the lumber dealers are engaged in fighting unreasonable demands, and we are willing to wait until the unions come to their senses or decide to withdraw some of their demands. The situation is very peculiar. Never in the history of labor unions have so many preposterous demands been made, which the employers cannot grant without virtually surrendering their business to the labor unions."

Other contractors who were seen said they were also willing to wait.

The Board of Building Trades met yesterday afternoon and appointed a committee of five to take charge of the present situation of affairs. This committee consisted of the following: Frederick Lemmons of the Elevator Constructors, W. H. Farley of the Tile Layers, Michael Stanton of the Electrical Workers, Richard Carvill of the United Derrickmen, and James Geelan of the Building Material Drivers.

The committee will try to see the officers of the Lumber Dealers' Association and the building material dealers to-day and endeavor to bring about some kind of a settlement.

The buildings that have been tied up for lack of building materials include the Belmont Hotel, Forty-second Street and Park Avenue; the new hotel at Forty-second Street and Broadway, the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company's annex at Twenty-third Street and Fourth Avenue, and several office buildings and apartment houses. Some of the down-town buildings are so far advanced that the present shutdown in the yards does not affect them. If the shut-down extends to Brooklyn it may affect eventually from 150,000 to 170,000 people. The building contractors fear that with the present strike fever in Greater New York there may be general strikes of trades where no strike had been intended.

According to the delegates of the Team Drivers' Union, seventy-one independent truck owners, who are not connected with any association, have made arrangements to try and break the deadlock caused by the lock-out in the building material and lumber yards. These delegates say that the independent truck owners will start on Monday to cart building material and lumber from non-association yards.

The Bricklayers' Unions and the Mason Builders' Association have come to a deadlock over the demand of the Bricklayers' Unions that the foremen must be members of the union. The bricklayers have withdrawn their demands for an increase of wages from 65 to 70 cents an hour, but have decided to stand by their demands about the foremen joining the union. The builders are just as firm in deciding that they will not enter into an agreement by which the foremen must join the union, though they will make no objection to the foremen joining the union voluntarily.

Unless this point can be settled at a meeting of the Joint Arbitration Board of the Mason Builders' Association and the Bricklayers' Unions, which will take place next week, New York may be confronted with the first general strike of bricklayers it has known in 20 years. Up to the present an agreement has been reached every year before May 1 by which the wages and conditions of work for one year are fixed. The delegates of the unions thought yesterday that a settlement might be reached.

There are 8,000 members in the eight Bricklayers' Unions in the Manhattan and the Bronx, and if they went on strike it would practically shut down all other work on the buildings on which they were employed.

KILLED IN STRIKE RIOT.

Special to The New York Times.

GREENWICH, Conn., May 8.—One man was fatally shot and another was badly beaten in a riot of striking Italian laborers at Field Point Park to-day. Had not Sheriff Ritch and a posse hastened to the scene of the trouble more fatalities might have resulted. Ten arrests were made. As the prisoners, chained together, were taken to the lock-up at midday much excitement prevailed.

Field Point Park is a new residential section where many wealthy New Yorkers are building mansions. It is on the shore of the Sound opposite the site at Indian Harbor of E. C. Benedict's house and overlooks Belle Haven. Last night the contractor building a house for Gustave Baumann of the Holland House, New York, paid off his gang of laborers, the best men receiving $1.50 a day and the inferior workmen $1.35. The latter refused to go to work this morning unless they received $1.50. The contractor heard the complaints, inquired who was the ringleader and promptly discharged him.

This man induced others to quit work until only the $1.50 men were working. They were threatened with harm if they did not stop, and finally threw down their tools. There were about fifty men in the crowd, and they went to the two houses which are being constructed for H. S. Thompson, a New York contractor, and made the men there stop work. Now a hundred strong, the strikers then went to Edward Shearson's place and ordered all the men to stop, waving pickaxes and clubs in their hands. All ceased labor.

The strikers then demanded that the foreman, Amadeo Filippo, join them in their march, but he refused, saying he would go home. The mob cornered him at a pile of lumber and half a dozen attacked him. One hit him in the head with a pick handle and then struck his shoulder, dislocating it. Filippo at this juncture pulled a 22-calibre revolver and shot Nicholas Brown, one assailant, in the pit of the stomach.

Sheriff Ritch and his deputies arrived about this time. The rioters were surrounded and Filippo and six others were pinced under arrest. Later the ringleaders, who had fled, were captured.

The rioters dispersed after the shooting instead of continuing their march to George F. Dominick's place, and some went back to work. Brown cannot live.

TO END THE OMAHA STRIKE.

Gov. Mickey Will Sit with a Conference Committee to Consider Labor Differences.

OMAHA, May 8.—A plan for the settlement of the strike which now involves more than 3,000 teamsters, restaurant workers, freight package handlers, and members of the building trades was reached late this afternoon.

The plan was agreed upon after Gov. Mickey had held extended conferences with leaders representing both sides of the controversy. It provides for the appointment of a committee of seven men from each side to represent the Business Men's Association and the labor unions, who will sit with Gov. Mickey as Chairman.

The committee will meet in Omaha next Monday evening to try to reach a basis of settlement. Meantime, the labor leaders have given their pledge to do everything in their power to prevent violence. The saloons were permitted to reopen this evening, the Mayor expressing the opinion that no trouble could now arise from such action.

Neither side to the controversy is willing to state on what grounds they will meet, but the opinion is generally expressed that the end of the strike is in sight. There was a large number of teams in the jobbing district this afternoon, and wagons were driven without molestation.

The peculiar spectacle of strikers in the role of deputy sheriffs protecting non-union men was presented on the streets this afternoon. The Business Men's Association promised Sheriff Power to furnish 100 trustworthy men for the service, but only a few appeared, and the Sheriff asked the labor union to furnish twenty-five men. They were picked out by the labor leaders and sworn in at the Court House.

TOWMEN APPEAL TO SHAW.

Want Department of Justice to Act in Case of Striking Marine Engineers.

Members of the Advisory Board of the Association for the Protection of the Commerce of the Port of New York met yesterday at the offices of its counsel, Senator Albert Wray, 170 Broadway. A letter was prepared appealing to the Secretary of the Treasury to request the Department of Justice to take up the matter of the marine engineers' strike.

The letter cited an act of Congress which makes it compulsory for marine engineers to hold a Government license before they can obtain employment. The Advisory Board holds that this act places them in a privileged class and abrogates the common law right which, prior to its passage, every man had to seek employment as a marine engineer on his own merits.

The independent employers assert that action should be taken to "enforce the duties which the licensed engineers undertook when they entered this privileged class."

The letter goes on to state that the masters and pilots of this and other large Eastern ports are waiting the outcome of the present marine engineers' struggle. If favorable, it is asserted, they, too, will make similar demands upon their employers.

MASONS' UNION YIELDS.

NEW ROCHELLE, N. Y., May 8.—Six weeks ago the strike of the workers in the building trades began and to-night came the first break. The masons' union was the first to yield. Ignoring the Building Trades' Council, it came to an agreement with the Builders' Association, and its men will go back to work on Monday, although the Building Trades' Council agreement was that all should stay out until all went back. The settlement affects all union masons along the Sound from the Bronx River to New Haven.

At Port Chester the unions and the employers have reached an agreement, and the troubles have been adjusted at White Plains, so that it is expected the tie-up in buildings will be over within a few days.

Coal Wagon Drivers Strike.

Coal wagon drivers went on strike yesterday against several dealers who refused their demands for higher wages. The team drivers are allied with the coal wagon drivers, through both organizations being locals of the International Team Drivers' Union. Coal wagons driven by non-union men were seen in different parts of the east side yesterday, each wagon being protected by a policeman.

House Wreckers Win Advance.

The delegates of the House Wreckers' Union, composed of the men who tear down buildings, reported last evening that they had gained demands for a new wage scale without strikes. There are 1,000 members in the union. The wages under the new scale are $1.75 and $2.00 a day for a nine-hour day. P. Long, business agent of the union, said last evening that the former wages were $1.10 and $1.50 a day.

FLAG FOR THE NORTH POLE.

Anthony Fiala Receives One at Dinner to Take on Expedition.

At a dinner given in his honor last night Anthony Fiala, who is to lead the second Ziegler Arctic expedition, received a small American flag bearing the emblem of the Young Men's Christian Association, which he will plant at the north pole—if he reaches it.

The dinner was given by Mr. Fiala's friends in the Brooklyn Young Men's Christian Association at the Central Branch, on Fulton Street. The diners numbered about one hundred.

Mr. Fiala said that he had selected Americans entirely to accompany him on his expedition, as he had discovered that they could endure more hardship than could men of other nationalities.

"I do not know whether I shall be able to reach the north pole or not," he added, "but in any case I shall place the flag at the most northern point we will reach."

The toastmaster was George H. Roberts. Others who spoke were Walter C. Burton, Henry Medd, Lieut. Charles Fiske of Troop C, Henry F. Gunnison, and Charles E. Teale.

ADVERTISE FOR POLICEMEN.

Special to The New York Times.

KENOSHA, Wis., May 8.—The City of Kenosha has been forced to insert advertisements in the newspapers in order to obtain men for its police force. In other years there has always been a rush to get on the force, but this year the Police and Fire Commission has not been able to secure sufficient men to fill the places.

There are now four vacancies, without a man on the eligible list. A strike is threatened on the force unless men can be secured to-morrow. The members of the commission have decided to advertise in the Milwaukee and Chicago papers for men.

New Yorker Killed in a Runaway.

MIDDLETOWN, N. Y., May 8.—John P. Crowley of New York City, manager of the Monticello House here, was instantly killed to-day by being thrown from a carriage during a runaway.

CANAL COMMITTEE RETURNS.

Progress of the Work at the Isthmus Found Satisfactory by Rear Admiral Walker and Other Inspectors.

Rear Admiral John G. Walker, Brig. Gen. Peter C. Haine, and Prof. William H. Burr of Columbia University, composing the Panama Canal Commission's Inspection Committee, returned from the Isthmus yesterday aboard the steamship Alliance, having examined the route of the proposed waterway.

The Rear Admiral said that the work that has been done and is now in progress was found satisfactory. He did not know anything about the negotiations with the Colombian Government.

Prof. Burr said there was nothing new to tell about the sub-committee's trip, even if its members could talk for publication before making their report, which they would not do before the return of President Roosevelt to Washington early next month.

Policeman Snyder Reinstated.

The Appellate Division yesterday ordered that Leroy Snyder be reinstated on the police force, but on condition that he shall stipulate to waive his back salary. He was dismissed on April 2, 1900, having been accused of neglect of duty in failing to report all of the circumstances relating to the recovery of a stolen watch and the repayment of $10 which had been borrowed on it.

Mene Peary Wallace, the last of the family of six Eskimos Lieut. Peary brought from the arctic regions several years ago, is in a serious condition in the Fordham Hospital from the same disease which carried off all the rest of his family, consumption.

Peary and Superintendent Wallace of the American Museum of Natural History, in whose house he has lived.

ELECTRIC CONCERNS PROSPER.

Special to The New York Times.

CHICAGO, May 8.—Reports of the Commonwealth Electric and Chicago Edison Companies issued to-day for their fiscal year ended March 31, 1903, show an extremely prosperous condition of the electric lighting and power business of Chicago. Gross earnings of the Commonwealth Company increased 30.20 per cent. over the previous year and gross of the Edison Company thereased 21.48 per cent.

The greater interest attaches to the Commonwealth Electric, since it will absorb the interests of the Chicago Edison Company when the latter's franchise expires some years hence. It is the Commonwealth, too, which is building a $6,000,000 plant in the southwestern portion of the city.

While the increase in the gross earnings of the Commonwealth was as noted, operating expenses increased but a little over 23 per cent., and the net earnings increased 51.30 per cent. The earnings on the capital stock, all of which is controlled by the Edison Company, were 3.16 per cent. However, this is not significant, since the company started with its present capital, and will prove a big earner when its stock shall be distributed at the expiration of the Edison charter.

White Plains Poolroom Indictments.

WHITE PLAINS, N. Y., May 8.—County Judge Platt to-day handed down his decision in the matter of the demurrer to the indictment found in the Yonkers poolroom cases. The persons indicted were Thomas S. Corbalis, J. F. Hanratty, Sylvester Smith, John Burns, Michael Devenny, and Thomas Kelly. Judge Platt dismisses the indictments on the ground that the law under which the men were indicted is defective.

More Parlor Furniture News

EVERYTHING grows in May. The other day the furniture bargain idea was planted by our securing the stock of a manufacturer retiring from business. It has grown marvelously since then.

In looking over our stock we have discovered a great many Parlor Suites and other pieces among our samples that we would like to renew, so we have added scores of splendid items to the offerings that came directly from the manufacturers. These goods are from our regular lines, and represent the best productions of the leading American furniture manufacturers.

On some of the pieces the reduction is small, on others it is fully half the regular price; but the collection is so choice and handsome that this is almost as good a furniture buying time as our August or February Sales. Certainly no equal offering has previously been made outside of these two months. Housekeepers who have furniture needs for Summer homes will profit largely by seeing the offerings announced here today:

PRINCE FERDINAND MAY QUIT BULGARIA

It is Doubted If He Will Have the Courage to Return.

He is in Danger, on the One Hand, of War with Turkey, and on the Other Hand of Assassination.

VIENNA, May 8.—Doubt is expressed in political circles here whether Prince Ferdinand of Bulgaria will have the courage to return to Sofia at the present critical juncture of affairs. It is even hinted that he may never return to the principality.

This doubt has been increased by the receipt of two telegrams from Bulgaria this evening. The first announces that the Prince, who is in Paris, has been attacked with a violent inflammation of the throat, which causes him great difficulty in breathing. The second telegram tells of the publication at Varna of a pamphlet accusing the Prince of having betrayed the ideals of his fatherland and containing threats of personal violence. This pamphlet is being circulated broadcast in Bulgaria and Hungary. It is believed to be of Macedonian origin.

BERLIN, May 8.—The Morgenpost publishes a dispatch from Vienna saying that the Prime Minister of Bulgaria has telegraphed to Prince Ferdinand at Paris, urgently requesting him to return immediately to Sofia.

The failure of Prince Ferdinand of Bulgaria to return to his country for the ceremony of laying the foundation stone of the mausoleum of the Russian officers at Plevna, which took place on April 25, excited a good deal of comment, as, indeed, did his trip to the Riviera, whence he went to Paris at the present time.

The Prince's position is a very difficult one, and also, it is believed, a very perilous one. The Paris correspondent of The London Times said in a dispatch dated April 19:

"It is no secret that the attitude of the Bulgarian Government with regard to the surveillance of the Bulgaro-Macedonian bands is not everywhere regarded as sufficient. Indeed, it is said that severe remonstrances on the subject have been made. Now, it is evident that the Austro-Russian entente covers the eventuality of any failure on the part of Bulgaria and Servia to abstain from allowing those countries to serve as bases for the revolutionary movement. I even believe I shall not be going far astray in adding that the agreement between the two powers in view of this particular contingency was the only one that could suggest itself.

"The Turks will be left to suppress any serious outbreak by unrestricted military measures. That implies that the operations of the Turkish army would not necessarily be confined to Turkish territory, but might, in case of need, extend across the Bulgarian and Servian frontiers. Even such an untoward turn of events is, no doubt, considered by the powers directly concerned as a smaller evil than the risk of a general Balkan conflagration, with the prospect, however remote, of European complications. Prince Ferdinand might thus find himself between the devil and the deep sea at no very distant date, and it may be that a trip to the Riviera appeared preferable to such an appalling dilemma.

"In any case seldom has a Prince been in a less enviable position nor in one rendering it so difficult to strike the right path without imperiling his throne and even his personal security.

"Briefly, the Prince's position is this: If he does what his people want he risks war with Turkey; if he goes counter to their wishes he is in danger of assassination.

FIERCE FIGHT IN MACEDONIA.

Insurgents, Surrounded by Turks, Throw Bombs and Escape in the Darkness and Confusion.

LONDON TIMES—NEW YORK TIMES Special Cablegram.

LONDON, May 9.—A Sofia newspaper, says The Times's correspondent in the Bulgarian capital, publishes a letter from Kostendil describing a conflict between Turks and two Bulgarian bands between Veles and Gradsko.

The insurgents, who were preparing a dynamite mine under a railway bridge, were surprised by a battalion of infantry and a squadron of cavalry. After repelling two cavalry attacks the insurgents succeeded in occupying a position on the neighboring heights and defended themselves for four hours. The Turks were largely reinforced, and the insurgents were surrounded, but they refused to surrender.

At nightfall twenty of the Macedonians charged the Turks, throwing twenty bombs simultaneously. The insurgents escaped in the darkness and confusion. They lost forty-two killed and wounded. The Turkish loss was far heavier.

THE ALBANIAN MENACE.

Turkey May Have to Subdue a Hardy, Well-Armed Race Numbering, Perhaps, 300,000—Sultan's Commission Safe.

LONDON TIMES—NEW YORK TIMES Special Cablegram.

LONDON, May 9.—A correspondent of The Times, wiring from Uskub, says that if the Albanians are recalcitrant, Turkey will have to subdue a hardy, well-armed race of highlanders, numbering from 80,000 to 100,000 at the beginning, and capable of expansion to 300,000 in case of their early success.

The Albanians are lacking in organization, but in fighting on their own ground they would have plenty of supplies and they would be certain to receive an inflow of arms and ammunition from sympathizers as soon as operations commenced, the Turkish fleet being quite unable to blockade the Adriatic coast.

By The Associated Press.

BERLIN, May 8.—A dispatch from Constantinople announces that the Turkish troops have occupied without opposition Ipek, Albania, the headquarters of the Sultan's commission, which was threatened by hostile Albanians.

The twenty-two Albanian chiefs, leaders of the opposition to the reforms, who were recently arrested at Prisrend, have been banished to Asiatic Turkey.

The commission referred to consists of a number of holy men sent by the Sultan to preach to the Albanians. Its mission was a dismal failure. The members of the commission pointed out that the reforms to which the Albanians object were in accordance with the Koran, but the Albanians were defiant, and declared that they would refuse to permit any reforms so to allow foreign Consuls north of Uskub.

FRESH ALARM AT SALONIKA.

Many Mines Believed to Exist—Panic at Monastir on Wednesday.

SALONIKA, May 8.—An additional quantity of explosives has been discovered here, and many mines are believed to exist.

A fresh outbreak is feared.

CONSTANTINOPLE, May 8.—The attempt made on Wednesday by a band of insurgents to blow up a powder magazine at Monastir caused a panic in that town. The shops and bazaars were instantly closed.

It is believed that the attack was made with a view to provoking reprisals. The military authorities, however, cordoned the Mohammedan quarter and prevented the Musulmans from getting out. All the Consulates were furnished with guards.

The attacking party, which was surprised by Turkish troops, ultimately fled, after a number of them had been killed or wounded.

FRENCH WARSHIPS SAIL.

TOULON, May 8.—Following the receipt by Admiral Fottier of cipher orders the French flagship Admiral Pothuau and the armored cruiser Latouche-Treville sailed for Salonika early to-day.

GOLD STANDARD FOR STRAITS SETTLEMENTS.

Report of the Currency Commission Says It is Practicable—The Change Likely to be Made Soon.

SINGAPORE, May 8.—The Currency Commission in its report declares that a gold standard for the Straits Settlements is practicable, and recommends the introduction gradually of a special Straits Settlements dollar of the same weight and fineness as the British dollar and circulating concurrently with the British and Mexican dollars. The report recommends the prohibition of the exportation of the new dollar and the prohibition temporarily of the importation of Mexican and British dollars until enough new dollars are in circulation to suffice for the business of this colony and the Malay States.

The scheme proposes ultimately to demonetize the Mexican and British dollars and then follow the course adopted by the Government of India.

In a recent report to the State Department Thomas Davidson, Vice Consul General at Singapore, said in part:

The burning question of the hour in this and neighboring districts is undoubtedly that relating to the currency.

As soon as it became known here that a commission had been appointed in England with a view to fixing a stable currency for Singapore and the Straits Settlements on lines somewhat similar to that which changed the Indian monetary standard a few years ago, the press took up the subject. Siam, which had apparently been making preparations for the event for some time past, immediately closed her mints to the coinage of silver. In Singapore, Penang, and the Federated Malay States the principal public bodies have held meetings to discuss the matter, and with one exception (that of the Chinese tin miners and mine owners, who are, however, an important and influential body) the general consensus of opinion has been for a fixed standard. This means either a dollar or rupee on a sterling exchange basis.

The currency of Japan, British India, Burmah, Ceylon, Java, and Siam has been placed on a gold basis, and proposals for the same are under consideration in French Indo-China and the Philippines.

It will probably only be a question of a few months before the change is made here. The principal shipping firms have already fixed the scale of wages of their officers and engineers upon a sterling basis, while several of the more important houses in other lines of business are contemplating the same procedure.

A HISTORIC SPLINT.

BERLIN, May 8.—Emperor William has caused a piece of bark twenty inches in length, bearing the inscription "His Majesty William II. used this as a splint March 27 in setting the Empress's broken arm," to be placed in the Hohenzollern Museum.

The piece of bark is now in the William II. Room, in a glass case, among gold and silver souvenirs.

AIRSHIP'S SUCCESSFUL TRIP.

Dirigible Balloon Built for the Brothers Lebaudy Sails Against a Brisk Wind —Ascent by Santos-Dumont.

PARIS, May 8.—The airship constructed for the Lebaudy brothers made a highly successful trip to-day under Pilot Juchmes and Engineer Rey. The start was made at 9 A. M. from St. Martin in a light rain and with a brisk wind blowing.

The airship passed over a number of suburban towns. At Manites it made a circle around the cathedral spire and left that town, going diagonally against the direction the wind was coming from. Over Limay, Mantes, and Rosny the airship was put through a series of evolutions and answered her helm and manœuvred to the perfect satisfaction of all interested in her. She then returned to her point of departure, where she descended without accident. The distance covered was 37 kilometers in 1 hour 26 minutes, against Santos-Dumont's record for the Deutsch prize of 11¼ kilometers in 30 minutes.

The Temps says that in view of the rain and wind the results obtained were notable, making aerial navigation in dirigible balloons appear to enter the domain of practical reality.

M. Juchmes furnished a report of the trip, in which he said the airship obeyed perfectly and was under perfect control. The screws revolved 600 times per minute, which was increased to 1,000 revolutions when sailing against a strong current of wind on rounding the Château de Rosny.

The people of the towns which the airship passed over gathered in crowds to witness the sight, and acclaimed the aeronauts.

To-day has been a record day in the annals of French ballooning. In addition to the trial of the Lebaudy airship, M. Santos-Dumont made his first free ascent of the season in his new airship, No. 9, this afternoon from the balloon park at Neuilly, where the aeronaut has constructed a vast shed in which are several of his airships. Upon leaving the park No. 9 was conducted by a guide rope to the Bagatelle Drill Ground in the Bois de Boulogne; there a series of manœuvres, at the height of thirty yards, and lasting half an hour, were made. During the evolutions the guide rope rested free on the ground. As Santos-Dumont did not have permission from the authorities to make use of the drill ground for his purpose, the guards interfered and had to stop the manœuvres. The airship was returned to its shed.

Santos-Dumont is satisfied with his ascent of to-day, which will shortly be repeated. When questioned, he said No. 9 was the smallest airship he had constructed, the cubes being of only 234 meters, and the motor of three-horse power. No. 9, however, has a rudder surface of twelve square meters. This ship is only intended for experiments, leading up to tests of No. 10, which has cubes of 2,100 meters, and which is intended to carry twelve persons. The aeronaut expects to be ready to make the trials of No. 10 in a month.

In the shed at Neuilly is also airship No. 7, with cubes of 1,200 meters' capacity, which has been specially constructed with a view to entering the contests at the St. Louis Exposition.

THE CHESS TOURNAMENT.

VIENNA, May 8.—The fifth round of the international chess masters' tournament, in which King's gambits accepted only must be played, was contested to-day, the pairing being as follows: Marocsy vs. Schlechter, Pillsbury vs Teichmann, Swiderski vs. Tschigorin, Gunsberg vs. Marshall, and Marco vs. Mieses.

When play was given over for the day Pillsbury and Teichmann had divided honors, Swiderski had gone down before Tschigorin, Gunsberg was beaten by Marshall, Marco lost to Mieses, while Marocsy and Schlechter had to adjourn their game, which will be resumed on Wednesday next.

It is interesting to note that for the first time in this contest the players of the black pieces have won the majority of games. The record follows:

	Won.	Lost.		Won.	Lost.
Marshall	4	1	Marco	2½	2½
Mieses	4	1	Marocsy	1½	2½
Tschigorin	3½	1½	Schlechter	1	3
Pillsbury	3	2	Swiderski	1	3
Teichmann	3	2	Gunsberg	½	4½

The pairing for the sixth round, to be contested to-morrow, has been arranged as follows: Tschigorin vs. Gunsberg, Teichmann vs. Swiderski, Schlechter vs. Pillsbury, Marco vs. Marocsy, and Mieses vs. Marshall.

Adhere to The Hague Protocols.

WASHINGTON, May 8.—Baron Gevers, the Netherlands Minister, and Baron Moncheur, the Belgian Minister, called at the State Department to-day to announce the intention of the Netherlands and Belgium Governments to adhere to The Hague protocols, and thus become parties in interest with Venezuela at The Hague.

Premier Balfour Declares Industry Should Be a Cause of International Amity, Not Enmity.

The 550 guests present included Ambassador Choate, Secretary White of the American Embassy, Lord Alverstone, Sir Henry Fowler, Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, John Morley, James Bryce, and other prominent persons. Seldom has a citizen of a foreign country been the centre of a more brilliant gathering.

Mr. Carnegie struck a happy note at the outstart, when he toasted King Edward as "the greatest of Ambassadors and the greatest harmonising force," and kept Premier Balfour in peals of laughter at his American anecdotes. Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman made an amusing speech in which he chaffed Mr. Carnegie with having his heart in Scotland, although he had temporarily assumed foreign citizenship.

The speeches of the evening referred, to a great extent, to the relations of capital and labor. The Duke of Devonshire said he thought Parliamentary interference should be limited to subjects directly involving the public interest.

Premier Balfour said he distrusted profoundly the current creed that the prosperity of one nation meant the adversity of another. Commercial rivalry and collision of interests between employer and employed were absolutely insignificant, he said, when compared with the great community of interests in production and scientific research, in which these rivalries ought to be lost and forgotten. Industry should be regarded as an international affair, not as international rivalry, but as international friendship. The more they could bring themselves to regard industry in that light the more he was convinced each individual community in the country would be prosperous.

Almost all the speeches eulogized Mr. Carnegie, Sir Henry Fowler particularly referring to his priceless services in promoting the friendship of the United States and Great Britain. These allusions were all warmly cheered.

The toast to Mr. Carnegie's health was received with the singing of "For He's a Jolly Good Fellow," and three cheers, and "another for Mrs. Carnegie." Mr. Carnegie's response was in a humorous vein and elicited constant laughter.

BIG STRIKE IN AUSTRALIA.

State-Owned Railroads of Victoria Tied Up Owing to Dispute with Government Over Unionism.

MELBOURNE, Victoria, May 9.—All the State-owned railroads of Victoria were tied up at midnight to-night in consequence of a curious dispute between the Government and the railroad employes regarding the right of the latter to affiliate themselves with the Victoria Trades' Hall, the headquarters of trades unionism in this colony.

The employes of the railroads are practically civil servants, and the Government contends that, in case of a strike in other trades affiliated with the Trades' Hall, the railroad men would be obliged to strike in sympathy, and therefore the Government notified the railroad men that unless they withdrew from the Trades' Hall before May 12 they would be dismissed. The Engineers' Association replied that unless the Government withdrew its notification before 5 o'clock last evening they would strike at midnight.

The Government guaranteed double wages for two months to non-strikers and notified the men that they would lose their pensions if they struck. About 11,000 railroad men are involved in the dispute.

The Government has arranged for a limited passenger service, but freight traffic is entirely suspended. Up to the present time the strike is confined to drivers and firemen. Already there has been a sharp increase in the prices of provisions and fuel. Over 3,000 miles of railroad are affected by the strike. A prolonged stoppage of traffic would paralyze trade and cause untold distress in the country districts. Public meetings are being organised and special prayers are being offered in the churches.

It is alleged that the strikers have been promised financial aid from English and American trade unions. The Government has called a special session of Parliament, which will meet next Wednesday.

FRENCH REVERSE IN THE SAHARA.

Tribesmen Capture a Big Baggage Train —Thirty Men Killed.

ALGIERS, May 8.—A French convoy has been attacked by tribesmen in the Figuig district. The baggage train was captured after fighting in which thirty men were killed.

The attacking force was composed of 600 horsemen and 900 men on foot of the Uladjerin and Benagull tribes. On the night of May 7 they attacked the convoy near Taghit, seventy miles from Figuig. The French baggage train was composed of 500 camels, loaded with provisions and clothing. The tribesmen carried off everything. Thirty men were killed and eighteen were wounded.

COURT AT BUCKINGHAM PALACE.

LONDON, May 8.—To-night was essentially a débutantes' night at Court. The weather was fine, and white dresses prevailed. Buckingham Palace presented a brilliant appearance. King Edward wore the uniform of the Irish Guards, of which he is Colonel.

Among those presented were Mrs. Frederick Peckham of New York, Mrs. Arthur Glasgow of London, and Miss Nina Gillett of Boston.

COLOMBIAN CONGRESS CALLED.

Romans Welcome Marconi's Mother.

LONDON TIMES—NEW YORK TIMES Special Cablegram.

LONDON, May 9.—The Rome correspondent of The Times says that Signor Marconi's mother, an Englishwoman, had in the Italian capital on Thursday almost as warm a reception as her son, in whose fame Italy has not grudged England a share. The Tribuna suggests that the inventor's success is no little due to the mixture of race, the blending of Italian genius and the practical qualities of the Anglo-Saxon.

LAURA BIGGAR'S CLAIMS.

Special to The New York Times.

ASBURY PARK, N. J., May 8.—Laura Biggar, the actress, who claims to be the widow of Henry M. Bennett, the Pittsburg millionaire, and who was made the chief beneficiary under the latter's will, has asked the executors of the estate for a settlement of her interests, offering to compromise with Peter F. McNulty, the next largest beneficiary. John F. Hawkins of this place, one of the executors, is opposed to the proposed adjustment, and says the matter must be brought out.

"There are over $200,000 worth of debts," said Mr. Hawkins to-day, "and my first duty is to the creditors. This does not include $300,000 worth of mortgages. There is no money on hand at present to pay them with, and the undertaker, doctors, and lawyers have not yet been paid, so I shall insist that everything pertaining to the estate be done in a thoroughly legal manner."

THE ART OF RODIN.

Sculptures by the Famous French Impressionist at the Arts Club.

True to its purpose of showing from time to time some of the more interesting foreign work, the National Arts Club has taken advantage of the visit of Miss Loie Fuller to New York in order to exhibit her collection of sculpture by Rodin and others.

These plaster casts, bronzes, marbles, drawings, and paintings by the master impressionist and a few kindred artists will be visible by card of member until the 16th.

The dances executed by Miss Fuller at the Universal, and later at her own little theatre in Paris, created a veritable furor among the Paris artists. Many sculptors, including Rodin, Gérôme, and Rivière, have attempted to model the impression made by her floating draperies; painters have tried to reproduce the color effects; and whether entirely successful or not, one has to give them the credit of the struggle with most difficult problems.

A number of these gallant struggles with the well-nigh impossible are to be seen in the little galleries of the club. It is the exhibition of Rodin sculptures, however, that makes Miss Fuller's collection particularly interesting, for on the one hand never before have so many been shown here at the same time, and on the other Rodin himself is the sculptor most discussed, most condemned, most admired and copied at the present day.

Just now Boston is rejoicing because Major Higginson has added three small bronzes by Rodin to the two he had already lent to the Museum of Fine Arts. They are "Vulcan Creating Pandora," "The Death of Alcestis," and "Brother and Sister." Those which have been for some time on exhibition in this museum are "The Flight of Love" and "Ceres"; both are marbles.

All five belong to the small groups which Rodin models with an idea of fitting them into some grand scheme, like the gateway of the Palais des Arts Décoratifs, which came to naught because the official who encouraged the plan lost his place, or the more widely famous composition to represent Dante's Inferno. After a time they may seem to the sculptor unworthy or unsuitable to the grand scheme, and then he carves them in marble or models them for bronze as independent symbolisms.

The present collection allows a much wider view of his work. Here in plaster are the large Adam and Eve, with their tremendous muscular development and their suggestions of Michael Angelo. "The Thinker" is here in bronze, a beautiful nude man of mature age, very Dantesque in spirit, the bronze very lovely in patina. The monument to Victor Hugo is represented by the powerful pensive head and by one of the two side figures, female and symbolical, which whisper in the poet's ears. The Hugo, seated on the rocks of Jersey like a Nocturne with scarce a bit of drapery on him, was the focus of a whirlwind of criticism and enthusiastic admiration when at last the sculptor showed it.

Another monument over which people came to blows was that for Honoré de Balzac. The sculptor withdrew it owing to the violence of the attacks made upon it. A small bronze head recalls this cause célèbre in the sculptural world of Paris. It shows one of Rodin's attempts to portray the genius who was at the same time a prodigy of industry and a monster in the life he led. And it is the head of a monster we see here. The head of the statue actually shown and immediately disapproved is much more human than this, with its haughty beak of a nose rising out of the old dressing gown like the proboscis of an Indian warrior wrapped in his blanket.

Typical of Rodin's methods is "The Divine Hand," an immense hand holding in a mass of clay in which little figures of a man and a woman are descried like worms in a fresh cut sod, but each human worm is very beautiful in modeling. This, too, was part of a grand group; the Biblical fashioning of man from clay by the Almighty has been treated here in a fresh and startling fashion, a fashion, be it remarked, that sets the teeth of the Philistine on edge. A recumbent nude woman belongs to a group for a "Temptation of St. Anthony," though in truth the name is ill-chosen, or the sculptor made a mistake to attempt such a subject.

The little figure is far too tragic. It is more like the Virgin of the Ether in the epic of the Finlanders, who was the sport of billows for centuries in the days of chaos. Her attitude is that of an utterly lonely maiden rolled up on the crest of a wave, not that of a temptress. Rodin is out of his element when the subject is sportive or sweetly seductive.

Like every strong artist, various currents have tossed Rodin about. There was his apprenticeship to the Sevres factory; much more important was his drudgery in Brussels as a stone cutter. There is his profound study of the old French carvers of wood and stone, who have left their works but not their names in the cathedrals at Beauvais, Rheims, Chartres, and Rouen.

There are certain examples of work by Rude and Carpeaux, even sometimes of Dalou—by the way, there is an admirable bust of Dalou by Rodin in this collection—and, of course, there is the overwhelming influence of Michael Angelo. To which of these influences, however, can one assign the "St. John the Baptist" and the little bronze in this collection of the head of John the Baptist on the charger, not to speak of the "Divine Hand"? Unclear of purpose, perhaps, unfortunate in having missed at first the full measure of inspiration, the curious relief called "The Moon and the Earth" is certainly unlike the work of any other master.

Rodin is not an impressionist without being subject to the dangers of impressionism. He who little dares achieves little. Rather is he a man of many, almost one might say continual, mistakes, a groper and stumbler in the dark. But also he is not the humbug that the outraged sculptors of another brand call him. When he fails, he has at least tried grandly, and in that he forms a brilliant contrast to the men who hug mediocrity to them like an amulet.

Rodin's work has a good deal of the quality of Wagner's music; it seizes one and carries one along despite all protests; it excites and disquiets one. But it makes one think and in the end compels one, however reluctantly, to acknowledge its power. The subject may have a classical name, but the art is not classic; rather is it barbaric of the Middle Ages in whose literature Wagner instinctively sought his subjects. May he live long and find the time to carry out some of the tremendous undertakings that wait for completion!

It would be unfair to forget the very admirable head of Rodin modeled by Mlle. Claudel, a splendid bronze, full of character and force. Comparisons can be made with a very early etched likeness of the sculptor by Bastien-Lepage, an early oil portrait by Benjamin Constant, and a later but apparently not recent head of him on canvas by John S. Sargent. Then there is a fine late photograph by Steichen, the American painter and art photographer, who is further seen in a painting of Beethoven, a very remarkable work indeed.

Nor can one easily overlook, despite its small size, a statuette by Rivière carved in tinted marble, the head, hair, and feet exquisitely wrought of ivory, which shows Loie Fuller at mid-career in one of her dances, the face almost laughing, the feet twinkling, the marvelous draperies swinging like the wings of a big Luna moth. Better than Gérôme in his sketch-model of the danseuse has the patient skill of Rivière expressed the lightness of the dance. There are but two of these captivating little creations in existence. The other belongs to the royal collections of Saxony.

NEGRO BISHOP'S VIEWS.

Thinks Provision Should Be Made for Educating Poor White Children.

Special to The New York Times.

ASBURY PARK, N. J., May 8.—"The white man thinks the negro a brute, and the negro thinks the white man a devil," said Bishop Derrick this morning at the opening of the third day's session of the New Jersey Conference of the African Methodist Episcopal Church. "And I want to see the time," continued the Bishop, "when man will look upon man as man regardless of race or color."

Bishop Derrick, in his address on education, referred to the gift of Andrew Carnegie to the Tuskegee Institute of $600,000. He said such gifts to the negro, without doing something for the poor white boys and girls, meant a crutch, and did not benefit the negro much. He thought that the poor white children should have some provision made for them also, because education and ignorance would not go hand in hand.

Later in the day a silver loving cup was presented to the Bishop by M. L. Frazier of New York as a token of appreciation for his service to the race.

It was decided to hold the next conference at Trenton.

HISSED LINCOLN'S NAME AND HIS NEGRO VIEWS.

Demonstration in the Manhattan Liberal Club Against American Institutions.

Horace C. Stanslaw, a young man who came from Alabama a few days ago to take part in a debate on the negro question at the Manhattan Liberal Club in East Fifteenth Street, last night was hissed off the platform because he read the declarations of Abraham Lincoln on that question, which he expressed in his famous debate with Stephen A. Douglas.

Moncure D. Conway also denounced the War President and declared that a young man should not be permitted to read such "mean and contemptible sentiments, expressed by such a scamp as Lincoln."

Two hundred persons cheered him to the echo, and only one man in the audience—Raymond S. Perrin—made any attempt to refute the utterances. The odds were too many for him to go on, and he was compelled to sit down.

Other speakers denounced the flag, the Government, the Supreme Court, and said in most emphatic terms that they were ashamed to be called American citizens.

The debate was led by ex-Assistant District Attorney James D. Carr, colored, who, after delivering a long address on the wrongs of the negro, said that he would rather be back in Africa, hanging from the limb of a tree by a tail, than enjoying the so-called rights of American citizenship.

"The taking away of the electoral franchise from the negro—a right conferred upon him by the State," said Mr. Carr, "will have a tendency to keep up a continual warfare throughout the country. The South to-day wants to take the vote away from the negro with the intention of making him get on his knees and asking the South to give it back again, so as to place him under obligations to the South. The way things look it is the intention of the South to make the negroes slaves again. The men who fought at New Orleans and during the civil war are entitled to citizenship. He is not a detriment to civilization."

Mr. Stanislaw was then called to the platform to express the Southern white men's view of the question. He said that Mr. Carr had not given the Southern view, but had only expressed Northern negro's opinion. He then read the sentiments expressed by Lincoln in the joint debate with Douglas in which he said that he believed in negro emancipation, but not in the mingling of the white and black socially.

Mr. Conway then got up and said:

"It is outrageous that a young man should be permitted to read those mean, contemptible sentiments expressed by such a scamp as Abraham Lincoln."

Mr. Conway then denounced the Government strongly for its present policy in the Philippines.

A man named Hoar said, in denouncing all forms of government, that Carr didn't know what "he was up against" when he came to speak before the club. He said that most of the members are people who didn't believe in any laws or any form of government.

"That thing they call 'Old Glory,'" he said, "is 'Old Gory.' Democracy is the rule of the mob. The negroes instead of trying to get on top, where there is plunder, should remain outside for a while and in another century they will be the rulers of the white men. There is law at the top, but where there is law there can be no liberty. Where there are men who own property there is robbery. All property is robbery. The State is an organization for plunder. I do not want to be a citizen of the United States."

Mr. Carr again rose to close the debate.

"After hearing all that I have heard," he said, "I feel that I am at home with you, and am ready to believe in no government. If any people should be Anarchists in the true sense of the word, the negro of the South should be."

The METROSTYLE

An addition to the Pianola by means of which it is possible to reproduce the exact interpretations of the great masters of the piano

JOSEPH SLIVINSKI says:

The most striking feature of the Pianola is the Metrostyle. Without this the Pianola, it seems to me, would lack the one feature which makes it possible for those who have not studied music to learn to interpret artistically the great masterpieces. Correct and artistic shading of tempo is the most difficult part of piano-expression.

The Metrostyle shows perfectly the delicate gradations of tempo as interpreted by the different great artists, and, when living, even by the composers themselves. It is extremely interesting to any one—invaluable to those trying to learn to play the Pianola with expression.

We unhesitatingly state we believe that the METROSTYLE is the most valuable and far-reaching improvement ever made in musical instruments, and that it rivals in importance the Pianola itself.

Music for the METROSTYLE will be interpreted by all the world's greatest musicians.

Selections have already been interpreted and marked by Maurice Moszkowski, I. J. Paderewski, Harold Bauer, and Emil Paur.

The first catalogue of METROSTYLE music (now ready) contains interpretations by each of the above virtuosi, in addition to 150 compositions interpreted by an authoritative pianist.

The METROSTYLE PIANOLA is on exhibition and for sale.

COURT'S BUSINESS STOPPED.

No Cases Ready for Justice Truax—Expresses His Disapproval of the Existing Calendar System.

While presiding in Trial Term, Part VIII., of the Supreme Court, yesterday, Justice Truax expressed his disapproval of the manner in which the present system of dealing with the cases on the calendar for trial by jury is working. He announced that he would bring the matter before his associates on the bench for their consideration, and also would ask the opinions of the legal profession generally on the subject of a change in the practice.

Justice Truax's observations were made on account of the fact that yesterday his calendar, from which cases are sent for trial to Parts IX., X., XI., and XII., broke down on account of the stated inability of counsel engaged in cases to proceed to trial. Justice Truax, in accordance with the rules of the court, sent a number of the cases to the foot of the general calendar, but yesterday, on proof by the attorneys interested that they had good grounds for adjournments, replaced their cases in their former positions. He then was compelled to adjourn his part of the court, as there was no case ready for him to try.

Prior to the consolidation of the Superior Court and the Court of Common Pleas with the Supreme Court, on January 1, 1896, each court had a system by which each trial part had its own calendar. Justice Truax said he considered a return to the old system would be an advantage when accompanied with necessary modifications to enable the courts to proceed uninterruptedly with business, and which would make it compulsory on lawyers engaged to make arrangements to have their cases tried when called.

CHANGES IN EXCISE LAW

Gov. Odell Signs the Bill Making Important Amendments.

Stamp Taxes for Druggists' Sales of Liquor—Penalties for Violation of the Statute Reduced.

ALBANY, May 8.—Gov. Odell to-day signed Senator Green's bill amending the liquor tax law in the respects asked for by the State Excise Commissioner.

It authorizes the appointment of a second Deputy Commissioner at a salary of $3,500, and under a bond of $20,000. It changes to half and half, in accordance with the division of the excise receipts, the proportion of various expenses to be paid by the State and localities, and authorizes the employment of special Assistant District Attorneys to conduct excise litigation.

The most important change involved in the new law is the establishment of a system of stamp taxes for druggists' sales of liquor. Under this provision druggists may sell in quantities not exceeding one pint without a physician's certificate, but each such pint must bear a ten-cent stamp to be furnished by the Excise Department. Only one such sale may be made to any one person on any one day. The sales are subject to all restrictions as to hours, no-license votes, and other matters, and a record of names, dates, and quantity sold must be kept.

The bill also reduces the penalty on a tax bond to the amount, plus one-half, of the tax for one year at the place licensed, provided that no penalty be less than $500. The police are to be notified immediately of the revocation of any license.

The bill reduces from five to three years the time after conviction of violation before a new certificate can be issued, and it meets recent court decisions by striking out the requirement that the certificate holders are answer to a complaint must be a sworn statement certifying to facts or innocence. It also concedes to the liquor dealers that a second conviction for violation in order to effect revocation of license must be the second within the same license year.

A further concession authorizes the court, upon conviction for a single sale of liquor without a license, to impose a minimum fine of one-half the regular tax for that place for one year. This will operate to allow a fine of $800 instead of $1,200 under the law as amended, and instead of $800, which would have been the minimum fine under the law prior to the recent amendment increasing the tax.

BILLS SIGNED BY GOV. ODELL.

Measures Changing the Compulsory Education, Assessment, and Other Laws Are Approved.

ALBANY, May 8.—Gov. Odell signed another lot of bills to-day, among them some which have provoked much discussion.

One was Senator Lewis's compulsory education measure, which comprises the programme of the various associations concerned in the child labor campaign. This bill, besides strengthening the provisions of the present law, lowers the age of compulsory school attendance from eight to seven years and requires 130 days' school attendance in the year preceding the fourteenth birthday as a requisite for employment.

Assemblyman Monroe's so-called "garnishee bill," permitting the attachment of salary or income over $20 a week for debts for necessaries of life; Assemblyman Bostwick's amending the New York City charter by providing for a separate statement of the value of land in assessments of real estate and for publication of the annual record of assessed valuation; Senator Marshall's forbidding Lloyds insurance associations from printing on their policies anything to imply that they are State standard policies, and Assemblyman Abrams's repealing the provision that the surplus over $250,000 of the New York City Police Pension Fund shall be turned annually into the general fund, were other important measures approved. These bills were also signed:

Senator GRADY'S—Forbidding court stenographers to be interested in any printing contract relating to the documents of the court.

Senator LEWIS'S—Relating to the construction of highway bridges on boundary lines of towns.

Senator STEWART'S—Forbidding the pollution of public waters by commercial establishments or others in a manner detrimental to public health. The State Health Department has jurisdiction, and is to issue permits for discharge of materials from factories into streams.

Senator McEWAN'S—Requiring copies of reports of charitable institutions to be filed with the fiscal supervisor, and adding the Superintendents to the Stewards for purposes of institution contracts.

Senator ELSBERG'S—Giving the College of the City of New York a share in the excise receipts of the city.

Senator AMBLER'S—Appropriating $40,000 for the Hudson House of Refuge for Women.

Senator GATES'S—Requiring reports to the Forest, Fish, and Game Commission by holders of shell fish licenses.

Senator FOLEY'S—Adding women over sixteen committed for first offenses of petit larceny, to those who may be sent to reformatories, and increasing the term of commitment to three years.

Senator LEWIS'S—Forbidding fraternal beneficiary societies not already doing so from making agreements to pay money after a fixed period.

Assemblyman McINERNEY'S—Excepting certain street opening proceedings in Kings County from the provisions of the railroad law relative to grade crossings.

Assemblyman LANDON'S—Permitting the detail to active duty of retired officers of the National Guard and Naval Militia.

Assemblyman ALLSTON'S—Authorizing the Supervisors of a town containing lands of the forest preserve to act as fire wardens if a suitable person cannot be found for appointment.

Assemblyman TREAT'S—Authorizing the assistant foreman of Clinton Prison to act as guard or keeper, and adding the Fiscal Supervisor of State Charities to the prison classification board in place of the Controller.

Assemblyman TREAT'S—Authorizing certain street paving in Auburn and providing means of paying therefor.

Assemblyman ROBINSON'S—Relative to changes in the number of members of the Board of Education in Union free school districts.

Assemblyman BOSTWICK'S—Relative to proceedings in the New York Municipal Court on claims for chattels.

Assemblyman REMSEN'S—Relative to allowances for counsel fees to the Kings County Sheriff for completing unfinished matters after the expiration of his term of office.

Assemblyman SHERRY'S—Authorizing inquiry into the claim of John J. Sheehan for services as attendant in the New York Municipal Court.

Assemblyman WARNICK'S—Relative to sale of real property in the interest of future parties whose identity is unknown.

Assemblyman KNAPP'S—Plattsburg Charter bill.

GOV. ODELL WANTS TO REST.

Declares That He Would Not Manage the Republican Campaign.

Special to The New York Times.

ALBANY, May 8.—Gov. Odell to-day characterized the story that his friends and the friends of Senator Hanna were desirous of having him take the Chairmanship of the National Republican Committee as nonsense.

"I have never had the suggestion broached to me," said the Governor. "There is nothing in it. I'm not looking for more work. What I want is more rest."

Friends of the Governor pointed out that there would be a decided impropriety in his acting as a manager of a campaign. The fact that Senator Hanna is now Chairman of the committee, it was stated, could not be considered a precedent which would justify Gov. Odell in accepting the place while he was still Governor. There is a very great difference, they said, between the relations of a Governor to the people and the relations of a Senator. The Governor is elected by the whole people, while a Senator is elected by partisan representatives in the Legislature.

The Cooper Union Literary Club will have its annual debate and entertainment to-night in the large hall of Cooper Union. This class was founded by Peter Cooper himself, and was for twenty-five years under the directorate of the late Dr. Zachos. Miss M. Helena Zachos is the instructor now. The subject for debate this evening is: "Resolved, that in favor municipal ownership of public utilities." Ex-Justice Joseph F. Daly will be the judge.

CAPT. DEEVY'S PROTEST.

Says He Has No Knowledge of Errors in His Record Furnished to the Civil Service Commission.

Jefferson Deevy, Police Captain in the Morrisania Precinct, appeared yesterday afternoon before the Municipal Civil Service Commission to show cause why his appointment as Police Captain, obtained as is alleged through falsification of police records by somebody, should not be revoked. The fact that on Nov. 8, 1899, Deevy was fined ten days' pay for being absent without leave was omitted from the certificate of his record furnished to the commission by the Police Department.

Capt. Deevy's statement was taken, a stenographic report made, and action reserved for a full meeting of the commission next week. President Willis L. Ogden, who was seen last night, said he did not know what the action would be.

Capt. Deevy sent to the commission before yesterday's meeting a letter protesting on the following grounds against action looking to the revocation of his certification on the eligible list:

(1) That I had absolutely no part in the furnishing to you of my record in the Police Department, and that any errors in the said record which may have existed occurred without my knowledge or consent.

(2) That your Board has no jurisdiction or right to review and overrule the action of the board which certified me upon the eligible list for a Captain of Police.

(3) That no evidence or proof of any kind that the addition of the fine of ten days' pay to my record would in the opinion of the examiners who examined me have reduced my rating below the minimum required for the board which certified me on the eligible list.

(4) That I was entitled to certification on the eligible list for promotion to my present position as Captain of Police, and as a veteran of the civil war was entitled to my appointment as Captain.

The alleged discrepancy in Capt. Deevy's record, along with others of like character, was brought to light by John Jerome Corkhill, Complaint Clerk of the Police Department, when he succeeded Robert A. Peterson, who was dismissed from the Police Department early in the present year.

LONDON UNDERGROUND'S PROFIT-SHARING NOTES.

Terms of the Underwriting Plan for the Issue of £7,000,000—Compensation of the Managers.

The terms of the underwriting plan for the £7,000,000 5 per cent. profit-sharing notes of the Underground Electric Railway Company of London were made public yesterday. They show some novel and interesting features, especially in the provision for the sharing of profits between the company and the subscribers to the notes.

The syndicate circular states that the syndicate is to continue until Nov. 1, 1904, unless the managers should dissolve it sooner. The managers also reserve the right to extend the syndicate further for six months from Nov. 1, 1904. The managers are Speyer & Co., Speyer Brothers of London, and the Old Colony Trust Company of Boston. They are to receive as compensation 1 per cent. commission on the entire amount of £7,000,000 notes, or £70,000, ($350,000.) This is to be paid by the London Underground Company, while the syndicate members are not to be charged anything by the managers. The syndicate's commission is to be 5 per cent. in cash, so that on the basis of a one-hundred-thousand-dollar subscription the actual payment which would have to be made would be only $95,000. All notes subscribed for by the syndicate are to be held subject to call, in other words, are to be pooled. The first subscription is due June 2.

The notes are to be subscribed at 96. They will be payable to bearer in various denominations; £5,000,000 of the notes are to be taken by the shareholders of the company. The notes will be secured by a trust deed, under which will be deposited securities of the "underlying properties to the amount of £10,056,000. Of this amount £7,750,000 will be stock of the Metropolitan District. Under the trust deed this stock may be sold by the Underground Company, and if sold at above 96 per cent. the amount of the net profits above that price are to be divided between the company and the noteholders, the latter participating pro rata in each sale at the time of which their notes were still outstanding. In other words, if notes are retired, as they may be, before the sale of any of such stock, they will not share in the profits. The more notes retired before any such stock is sold the greater will be the profit to the underground company.

OFFERING REAL ESTATE.

Law That Compels Dealers to Have Written Authorities of Owners Declared to be Constitutional.

The Appellate Division in a decision yesterday held that the section of the Penal Code which makes it a misdemeanor in cities of the first and second class for any person to offer real estate for sale without the written authority of the owner is constitutional and a valid exercise of the police power of the State.

The decision is contrary to that of the Second Appellate Division in the case of Grossman vs. Caminez. (79 App. Div. 15.) The Justices of the Second Appellate Division said that they had been unable to find any case which holds that the Legislature can make an act, innocent and harmless in itself, a crime in one portion of the State and not in another.

Justice Patterson, who gave the opinion of the Appellate Division Justices of this department, said that was exactly what had been held in the Havnor case. (149 N. Y. 195.) There the Court of Appeals passed upon an act that made it a misdemeanor for any person to work at the trade of a barber on Sunday except in the City of New York and in Saratoga Springs, where business might be carried on until 9 o'clock in the afternoon on that day. The act was held to be a valid exercise of police legislation, and to work no deprivation of liberty or property within the meaning of the Constitution.

Justice Patterson, after saying that the same offense, punishable under a general law, may be punished differently in different parts of the State, and that the Legislature may control and regulate, for the benefit of the public, methods by which business shall be transacted, continued: "The statute relates to rights of owners of real estate in certain designated parts of the State. It is a statute for the protection of such owners, to prevent unwarranted interference with their property, &c."

There is an obvious public benefit to be derived from it, Justice Patterson added, and it does not interfere with the transaction of a lawful pursuit.

CENTRAL PACIFIC SUIT.

Stockholders' Application for Injunction to Prevent Issue of Securities Denied.

In the action brought recently in the United States Circuit Court by Walter Morshead and G. Emily Reynolds, in behalf of the stockholders of the Central Pacific Railroad Company of California, against the Southern Pacific Company, the Central Pacific Company, the Central Trust Company, the United States Trust Company, the Union Trust Company, Speyer & Co., and the Central Pacific Railroad Company, Judge Lacombe yesterday denied the application of the plaintiffs for a temporary injunction to restrain the defendants from issuing certain securities against the property of the Central Pacific Railway Company.

"The first prayer for relief," said Judge Lacombe, "is that the deeds, conveyances, and instruments of transfer given in 1885 by the Central Pacific Railroad Company of California to the Central Pacific Railway Company of Utah be decreed to be fraudulent and void and of no effect, and every other relief prayed for in the bill is based upon the setting aside of such conveyance. The plaintiffs are stockholders of the Central Pacific Railroad Company. To such a suit the railroad company is an indispensable party. It has been named as a party defendant in the bill, but it has not been served, nor has it appeared. It is, therefore, not before this court upon this application, and in its absence the court will not examine into the merits of an application which must be dismissed for defect of parties.

BOY SET FIRE TO SCHOOL

Little Eddie Luke Sought to "Get Square" with Teacher.

Miss Campbell Averts Panic and Helps to Extinguish the Blaze—Culprit Arrested.

In order to "get square" with one of the women teachers, against whom he had a fancied grievance, ten-year-old Eddie Luke of 41 Underhill Avenue, a pupil in Public School 132, in Butler Street, near Fourth Avenue, Brooklyn, on Thursday deliberately set fire to the big school building, in which 1,500 children were assembled at their studies. That there was not a great conflagration and probably panic attended with the loss of many lives is due largely to the coolness and presence of mind of one of the woman teachers who discovered the flames.

As it was, the fire was confined to the closet of the classroom where Luke had started it. The blaze was extinguished by the teachers without the aid of the Fire Department and without the knowledge of the pupils.

The cause of all the mischief is at present languishing in the rooms of the Children's Society, waiting until Assistant Fire Marshal Beers can decide what to do with him. Eddie Luke's mother protests that her son is not very so bad a boy as the teachers say he is, but Eddie himself frankly admits that he set the schoolhouse on fire, and that he has been "to see" the Principal of the school many times for various infractions of discipline, principally talking during study hours and smoking cigarettes.

The boy is the son of William Edward Luke, a bookkeeper, but has spent most of his life with his grandmother, who lives in South Brooklyn, and gives him lots of spending money and otherwise pets him. That is believed not to have done Eddie any good, and he has been a thorn in the flesh of Principal Ludwig for many months. Within a very short time the youngster has been in three classes, and in each the teacher complained that he was practically incorrigible. He was in Miss Phillips's class on Thursday morning, and Miss Phillips very soon sent him to the Principal's room for being "out of order."

The Principal's room is on the second floor, about forty feet from the classroom in which Miss Edna Campbell teaches the little boys and girls in the third primary grade. When Miss Campbell and her class passed along the corridor on the way to the gymnasium they encountered Eddie Luke, standing in the corridor in front of the principal's door, waiting to be called in. He was shuffling his feet in the corridor in a defiant and noisy manner, and Miss Campbell paused long enough to administer a sharp rebuke. Luke was left to meditate over the general perverseness of school teachers in general and Miss Campbell in particular. Then he bethought him of some matches in his pocket. Here was indeed a chance to "get hunk" with Miss Campbell at least.

The boy slowly crept into the empty classroom and opened a closet which contains papers and rubbish. He drew a pile out, and making a heap of it, struck a match and applied it. There was soon a twinkling little blaze, but he was not content with that. He struck another match and another until he had the bonfire going well.

A few moments later a diminutive boy was hurrying down the street from the direction of the schoolhouse, and at about the same time Miss Campbell's class was returning to the classroom from the gymnasium. Miss Campbell, who walked ahead, heard the crackle of flames in her classroom, and saw smoke issuing from the door. Without a moment's hesitation she turned and faced her class.

"Now, turn about, dears, and march down stairs just as quietly as possible," she said. "This is fire drill, although the bell has not sounded. It's a new kind of fire drill."

The children unquestioningly obeyed. Miss Campbell encountered a teacher in the corridor. "There's a fire in my classroom," she said. "Notify the Principal, and I will try to put the fire out."

The other teacher, borrowing some of Miss Campbell's presence of mind, did as bid. A moment later the bell for the fire drill was rung, and the 1,500 pupils arose and marched quietly to the street, wondering what it was all about. Meantime the Principal and other teachers had gone to Miss Campbell's assistance, and within a short time after organizing a bucket brigade, they had the fire extinguished. Miss Campbell had closed all the windows and fanlights, and shut off draughts. A little later the pupils were reassembled in their classrooms as if nothing had happened—all except Miss Campbell's class. It had the rest of the day off.

The principal had found burned matches on the floor and immediately concluded that the classroom had been set on fire. He began to investigate. Here is where a bad reputation comes in unhandily. The principal, when he thought of badness, at once thought of Eddie Luke. Inquiry showed that Miss Phillips had sent him to the principal's room to be "corrected" and the principal hadn't seen him. Eddie Luke had disappeared. Then the Fire Marshal came and yesterday morning, when Eddie Luke still did not appear at school, two detectives from the Bergen Street Station went around to his house and took him before Capt. White. When asked about the fire at the school the boy readily admitted that he started it. He said he didn't mean to burn the building down, but just wanted to "scare the life out of Miss Campbell."

W. W. FARMER GETS DECISION.

Suit to Regain from Type Trust the Foundry at Beekman and Gold Streets.

The Appellate Division handed down a decision yesterday, affirming by a unanimous vote, a decision of Supreme Court Justice Steckler, in favor of William W. Farmer, who sought to get possession of the type founding plant of A. D. Farmer & Sons, at Beekman and Gold Streets. The plant and business, valued at $1,000,000, have been in the possession of the American Type Founders' Company for three and one-half years.

Mr. Farmer, for a loan of $75,000, to be used in the company's business, pledged stock of the company, and obtained the money through Emil Klober, representing John E. Searles, then said to be identified with the American Type Founders' Company. When the loan became due Mr. Farmer proposed payment, but was informed, he declared, that the amount represented a sale of the A. D. Farmer & Sons plant, and he dissented.

The matter was carried into court, and a motion that was granted by Justice Beach placed the property in dispute in the possession of the Searles interests, Francis O. Blackwell, a son-in-law of Mr. Searles, taking charge. Later new Directors were elected. Mr. Farmer has fought the case ever since.

ACCUSED SCHEMER'S TRIAL.

Ewen H. Clarke, alias Charles Carbonell, was on trial before Justice Fitzgerald yesterday on a charge of grand larceny in the first degree in connection with the operation of a mining scheme.

The complainant, George W. Essinger, a real estate dealer of 200 East One Hundred and Twenty-second Street, testified that on March 5 he answered the advertisement of Ignatius A. Qualey, as President of the Horse Shoe Mining Company, at 21 Park Row, for a loan of $4,000 for a week, with a guaranteed return of $12,000. Qualey told him, he said, that he knew a man who had 1,500 shares of the stock for sale at $9 a share, and that he would pay $14.50 a share. Mr. Essinger went to the Hotel Grenoble, where he saw Clarke, and bought $7,000 worth of stock, which Qualey refused to buy.

The other indicted men are Frank Putnam, who was convicted day before yesterday; Frederick Herbert, Frank L. Waller, Ignatius Qualey, and "Lawrence Sommerville." Qualey, who was out on bail, was committed to the Tombs yesterday. The case had not been finished when court adjourned.

CROTON DAM'S WEAKNESS

Engineer Hill Reports on Changes and Reconstruction.

Strata of Limestone Foundation of Core Wall Found to be Disintegrated—Consulting Experts Named.

Chief Engineer Hill of the Aqueduct Board yesterday reported to the commission on the weakness of the new six-million-dollar Croton Dam, and outlined the changes and reconstruction work deemed necessary as the result of investigation.

In excavating for the continuation of the dam to form the new reservoir, which will put under water about twenty square miles of territory, the underlying limestone foundation of the core wall several months ago was found to be weak in parts, owing to the disintegration of the strata. The main dam was to be continued to the south, because it was believed that an earthen embankment, or core wall, into which it ran would in time become susceptible to the immense pressure exerted by the penned-up water, and that seepage would follow with possibly more serious results.

The dam was to be continued until it could be anchored into the rock formation of the hill to the south. Mr. Hill knew of the disintegrated condition of the limestone formation as soon as it was disclosed, and five weeks ago he reported on it to the Aqueduct Commission. He said that the faulty portions of the strata would quickly absorb water, and could be crushed into sand in the hand. The excavation to reach solid rock for the continuation of the masonry dam had then reached 115 feet without discovering a safe foundation.

At Mr. Hill's suggestion, Mayor Low appointed two eminent geologists—Prof. James F. Kemp of Columbia University and John J. Stevenson of the University of the City of New York—to report on the adverse conditions revealed by excavating, and they, in two reports, showed the insecure and unstable character of the formation underlying the core wall. In certain locations the disintegrated limestone "ran with water like sand," and they were uncertain how far down this disintegration penetrates. They also found the condition of the formation of Gatehouse No. 1, on the southern hill, and the adjoining portions of the old aqueduct as "deserving very serious consideration." Mr. Hill found a few days ago that forty-five feet below the base on which the core wall stands no improvement was shown in the condition of the strata.

In his special report to the commission yesterday Engineer Hill said:

As a result of these investigations it may be necessary to construct a cut-off across Gatehouse No. 1 and small portions of the adjoining sections of the old aqueduct and to make further geological and engineering examinations.

The Chief Engineer added that the condition to which he called attention did not necessarily involve the stability of the main section of the dam. Beds of softer material than the surrounding rock existed before the construction of the dam was begun. These were examined and treated. There are no evidences at present of leakage in the masonry, but any doubt in regard to any element of stability should be set at rest by investigation.

At Mr. Hill's suggestion, the Aqueduct Commissioners yesterday appointed Prof. William H. Burr of Columbia University, who has just returned from the Isthmus of Panama and who is a member of the Commission on Additional Water Supply, Consulting Expert Engineer, to advise with the Commissioners and consult with their Chief Engineer on the whole subject of Croton Dam conditions. Prof. Burr is already familiar with the character of the limestone formation underlying the core wall at the south end of the dam, and has experimented with the disintegrated limestone.

THREE BROTHERS LONG PARTED

To Meet in Liverpool After Twenty-nine Years—David Cochrane of Riverside, Cal., Is One of Them.

Three brothers, who have not met in twenty-nine years, are to have a reunion at Liverpool, England, early in June. One is David Cochrane, owner of two hotels at Riverside, Cal., at one of which President Roosevelt was a guest yesterday. Mr. Cochrane and his wife are at the Fifth Avenue Hotel, and will sail for Europe on the Campania on May 30.

"I am looking forward to a very pleasant time," said Mr. Cochrane yesterday. "I have not seen my brothers in nearly thirty years, but I am thankful to be able to say that I believe we have all prospered.

"My brother William was for years a Captain in the old National Line of transatlantic steamers. His latest command was the Spain of that fleet. He has many friends in New York and is now living in retirement at Liverpool, and it is at his home I am to meet my other brother Edward. Edward went to South Africa many years ago and he has been very successful. He served under Gen. Baden-Powell at Mafeking, and Cecil Rhodes counted him as among his best friends. Edward, who makes his home at Bulawayo, will arrive at Liverpool about the same time that I do."

WOUNDED BY STRAY BULLETS.

SAN FRANCISCO, May 9.—Ensign Charles Huff and Boatswain's Mate McNamara of the crew of the cruiser Boston were wounded by being struck by stray bullets from the cruiser Marblehead while the crew of the latter vessel were engaged in sub-calibre target practice.

The crew was engaged at this practice while the Marblehead was in Magdalena Bay, lying about 400 yards from her, as the Boston, with her men likewise engaged. It was not thought that the bullets would carry as far as the Boston, and no danger was anticipated until there came a signal from her to cease firing in her direction. Ensign Huff was injured in the arm and the boatswain's mate received a severe scalp wound.

ANOTHER ARREST IN BARREL MURDER CASE.

Prisoner Is Giovanni Zacconi—Seven Men Held by Coroner's Jury as Accessories to the Crime.

Giovanni Zacconi, owner of the Stanton Street butcher's shop, where the Secret Service agents saw Benedetto Madonia, the barrel murder victim, with some members of the gang on the last night he was alive, was arrested last night by Detectives Carey and McCafferty at his home, 145 Hudson Avenue, Brooklyn, and taken to Manhattan Police Headquarters.

Earlier in the day the Coroner's jury that heard the testimony presented at the inquest had returned a verdict that the crime was committed by some person or persons unknown to them, but calling for the detention as accessories to it of Zacconi and of six of the men already in custody, namely, Giuseppe Morello, Giuseppe Fanara, Tomaso Petto, Vito Laduca, Pietro Inserello, and Antonio Genova. These six prisoners were committed to the Tombs without bail to await the action of the Grand Jury.

Antonio Genova, against whom a perjury charge was pending, was taken before Magistrate Cornell in the Tombs Police Court, where he was released on that charge and rearrested on the homicide charge.

Morello was up before Justice Bischoff during the morning on a writ of habeas corpus secured by his counsel, Charles Le Barbier. The latter contended that the Coroner had no right to keep Morello in the House of Detention in default of $5,000 bail and also contended that bail should not have been fixed in excess of $100 in the case. In spite of opposition to the request Justice Bischoff acceded to Assistant District Attorney Gray's suggestion that an adjournment be taken until the afternoon to allow the Coroner to make a return to the writ. After the verdict of the Coroner's jury the writ was withdrawn.

"To Cure Him of Cigarette Habit."

ORANGE, N. J., May 8.—Five young men who were arraigned before Recorder Dervmus in the East Orange Police Court last night on a charge of disorderly conduct gave a queer excuse. They were John McGinley, Charles McGinley, Frank Law, George Sewell, and Nelson Conover. Edward March, fourteen years of age, declared that on Wednesday night they seized him, took him into the Prospect Street Station of the Erie Railroad, and beat him. In defense the men said they were trying to break the boy of the cigarette habit. The court did not think their conduct was justified

INGOLD WON THE STAKES

A. Featherstone's Horse, Heavily Backed, Took the Larchmont.

Two Morris Park Races Went to R. T. Wilson, Jr.—Favorite Fell After Last Jump in the Hurdle Stakes.

In flat violation of turf tradition, an immense attendance gathered at the Morris Park race track yesterday, though the day fell between two racing holidays. The public favorites were beaten in five of the six races.

The only thing that approached a reverse for the layers of odds was the outcome of the race for the Larchmont Stakes, at seven furlongs, for three-year-olds, in which a "good thing" from the stable of A. Featherstone went through in a head finish, but even then the sting of the coup made by the Featherstone following was atoned for by the defeat of the odds-on public choice Contusion, who raced in the colors of State Racing Commissioner E. D. Morgan. Ten horses ran for the stakes. Contusion was first away, but Ingold went up to her at once, and in the first half furlong showed in the lead, Contusion galloping well in hand and permitting Ingold to make the running around the first turn. As the horses approached the bend into the stretch Contusion began to drop back and in the next few yards was swallowed up in the crowd, Ingold then drawing away from the others and seemed to have the race safe. In the final furlong, however, Brigand closed from behind, and, gaining on the pacemaker with a splendid rush at the finish, drove Bullman to hard riding in the last few strides, Ingold then winning all out by a head, while Brigand was two lengths clear of Love Note, third. The reason for the sudden collapse of Contusion was explained when that filly finished, for she pulled up so lame that it is thought that she has broken down permanently.

The opening event produced a result that stood out as remarkable, even among the many startling things that jumping races have caused at Morris Park in the past, and backers were kept busy for the remainder of the afternoon trying to explain the occurrence. Big Gun, ridden by Mara, regarded as the best steeplechase jockey now riding, started a hot favorite for the race, the St. Nicholas Hurdle Stakes, and after running a waiting race, went on and led over the last jump, seeming then to have the race won. He was over all right, but for some unexplained reason fell after he had landed his forelegs and was gathering himself for another stride, and Mara went over his head. Ohnet, just behind him, was so close that Songer, who rode him, in an effort to pull aside, pulled into the fence, and badly lacerated his own leg, in addition to so interfering with Ohnet that Seminole, a 40 to 1 chance, came on and beat him out, Ohnet further adding to the sensations of the finish by striking down Mara as the unlucky jockey was trying to scramble out of the way. Further back up the stretch Cigar fell with Jockey Brady and surely bruised that rider. Mara also was badly shaken up and bruised in the tumbling that he got. R. T. Wilson, Jr., won two races with the horses Highlander and Carbuncle, both ridden by T. Burns.

Rivalry among owners of horses that ran in the Metropolitan Handicap, and were beaten by Gunfire, resulted in the arrangement of a special sweepstakes, at the same distance and with the same weights as in the Metropolitan, and G. B. Morris entered Old England and R. A. Smith entered Articulate for the race to be run today. It was stated that Lux Casta also would get started by her owner, H. T. Oxnard. Summaries:

YESTERDAY'S BASEBALL GAMES

Manager Griffith of the New York American Team Disciplined—Philadelphia Again Beaten.

Presidents Pulliam and Johnson of the National League and American League, respectively, are determined to maintain order and discipline on the baseball fields of the major leagues at any cost. The former has announced the suspension of Wagner of the Pittsburg team for three days for threatening to strike Umpire Halliday on the Pittsburg grounds during Thursday's game. President Johnson has disciplined Manager Clark Griffiths of the Greater New York Club team for using abusive language in an argument with Umpire Connolly in the final game of the Philadelphia team's series at American League Park last Wednesday. Both of these officials issued instructions to the managers, Captains, players, and umpires regarding the suppression of "rowdyism" on the baseball grounds and by taking action so quickly after the first serious outbreaks they have shown plainly that unseemly conduct will not be tolerated.

The New York Nationals won another game from the visiting Philadelphians at the Polo Grounds yesterday, and that their efforts are being appreciated is best shown by the increasing attendance at each succeeding game. The Brooklyn team is not quite so fortunate, and the young California pitcher, Schmidt, after being batted hard for seven innings by the Bostons yesterday, had his hand so badly bruised that he will be unable to pitch for several days to come.

Chicago still leads the American League clubs in the percentage of games won, although beaten yesterday by St. Louis. During the suspension of Manager Griffth, which began yesterday and will expire next Monday, the Greater New York team will be in charge of Capt. Willie" Keeler, and the men did very good work under his direction in Boston yesterday, as they defeated the local team and got back into third place. The American League champions of Philadelphia are still second in the order of merit, with Boston fourth and Detroit leading the second division.

Following are the scores in the games of the National and American Leagues, respectively:

New York, 7; Philadelphia, 3.
Boston, 8; Brooklyn, 1.
Chicago, 5; St. Louis, 2.

New York, 6; Boston, 1.
St. Louis, 13; Chicago, 12.
Cleveland, 7; Detroit, 6.

New York Nationals Win in the First Inning by Getting Seven Runs.

In the first inning of the baseball game between the New York and Philadelphia teams on the Polo Grounds yesterday the local players scored seven runs. These proved to be more than they needed to win the contest, as the final score was 7 to 3 in New York's favor. The visitors began badly, but gathered themselves together after the first inning, and kept the home team from increasing its score during the remainder of the game. Duggleby, who pitched for Philadelphia, gave a very fine exhibition of his ability in the second and subsequent innings, and he got excellent support from the men in the field, but his and their efforts were all to no purpose, as they were unable to effectually cut down the big lead which their opponents had secured at the outset, as their batting only netted one run in the second inning and two in the fourth. Taylor pitched very steadily, and the fielding of the home team was almost perfect. New York's seven runs in the first inning were tallied on five hits, one base on balls, and four errors. BOSTON, 8; BROOKLYN, 1.

Manager Hanlon's Brooklyn players were unable to duplicate their victory of Thursday in yesterday's game against the Boston nine and succumbed to the visitors, who won by the score of 8 to 1. Piatt, the Boston pitcher, held the local men well in hand after the opening inning, in which they made their single tally on Strang's bunt, Tenney's bad throw, McCreddie's sacrifice, and Sheckard's safe hit. In all the Brooklyn batsmen only got three hits off Piatt, while the visitors hit safely sixteen times. Schmidt, the young Californian, was hit freely, although he had shut out the opposing teams in his three previous games.

In the seventh inning Schmidt stopped a very hard drive off Cooley's bat and injured his hand so badly that he was compelled to retire at the end of this inning, and Thielman pitched during the eighth and ninth. Thielman struck out three men in the last two innings and was hit safely twice. Greminger led the other visitors in batting as he made four hits, one of which was good for three bases. During the ninth inning Bonner of the Boston team disputed a decision given by Umpire Moran, and he was put out of the game by that official, his place at second base being taken by Aubrey. BOSTON, May 8.—The New York Americans outbatted and outplayed the local team to-day, and won by the score of 6 to 1. Chesbro was in his best form, and his pitching was very effective. In the absence of Capt. Collins, the team play of the locals was very weak. Keeler's running catch was the fielding feature. The score:

MANHATTAN, 4; SYRACUSE, 3.

At Jasper Oval yesterday the Manhattan College baseball team defeated the Syracuse University nine after a close contest by the score of 4 to 3. Minahan pitched cleverly for the locals, only allowing one base on balls and striking out four men. Henderson's splendid drive to deep centre scored a home run for the visitors. The batting honors were pretty evenly divided, the home team making seven and the visitors six hits. Rock's fielding at short was an excellent exhibition. The score:

LAFAYETTE 12, N. Y. UNIVERSITY 6.

The New York University baseball team was defeated by the Lafayette College nine on Ohio Field yesterday, the visitors winning by a score of 12 to 6. Both teams played evenly up to the seventh inning, when through several errors of the home players the visitors made four runs, and followed up with five more in the eighth under similar conditions. In the final inning the home team scored four runs. The score by innings:

	R.	H.	E.

Yale Nine Wins Two Games.

EXETER, N. H., May 8.—Yale defeated Phillips Exeter Academy at baseball this afternoon by 5 to 3. Exeter batted nearly as well as Yale, but Allen proved effective at critical points. Score by innings:

	R.	H.	E.

ANDOVER, Mass., May 8.—Phillips-Andover held the Yale baseball team in fine shape for seven innings to-day, but in the eighth numerous errors gave the visitors four runs, which practically won them the game by a score of 6 to 1. Both pitchers were very effective, Baker holding the Yale batsmen down to three scattered hits, Metcalf played brilliantly at short for Yale. Score by innings:

	R.	H.	E.

Cornell Athletes Thank Carnegie.

ITHACA, N. Y., May 8.—Cornell annual athletic junior smoker was held in the armory to-night. Prof. Frank Irvine, the newly elected member of the Athletic Council; Dean T. F. Crane, John Moakley, trainer of the track team, and Hugh Jennings, the baseball coach, made addresses. Athletic shingles were awarded to the candidates who made Varsity teams during past years. Resolutions thanking Andrew Carnegie for his gift to student typhoid patients were passed.

COLUMBIA ATHLETES LOSE

Special to The New York Times.

PHILADELPHIA, May 8.—Pennsylvania defeated Columbia in the annual dual games between the two universities on Franklin Field this afternoon, the final score after the thirteen events had been contested being 68 to 49. Firsts counted 5 points, seconds 3 points, and thirds 1 point. In only one event was every place taken by one university, that being in the broad jump, the Morningside Heights team winning all three places. Each university was represented by three men, excepting the two hurdle races, the width of the track preventing more than four men running abreast, so only a quartet of hurdlers contested, two for each institution.

All the short distance races were fought to the tape, Columbia making a desperate effort to turn the tide of defeat that had set in against her from the first. The Quakers, however, always seemed to have a little speed in reserve, and won in a most confident fashion. The time in the half-mile and two-mile runs was exceptionally good for this season of the year. In the former Orton and Klaer of Pennsylvania, and Kohn and Taylor of Columbia, four of the best half-mile college runners, were matched. Klaer and Taylor set the pace, but near the finish Orton and Kohn spurted, the former finishing first, with Kohn second, who passed Klaer a few feet from the tape. A. C. Bowen of Pennsylvania captured the two-mile race in an apparently easy fashion in 9:58 3-5. Summary:

One-Mile Run.—Won by C. A. Fulton, Columbia; second, J. A. Standen, Pennsylvania; third, A. McDonald, Columbia. Time—4:49.

440-Yard Run.—Won by H. A. Hyman, Pennsylvania; second, A. B. Gill, Pennsylvania; third, C. Wood, Columbia. Time—0:51 2-5.

Two-Mile Run.—Won by A. C. Bowen, Pennsylvania; second, Edward Russell, Pennsylvania; third, G. Lanzler, Columbia. Time—9:58 3-5.

Putting Sixteen-Pound Shot.—Won by T. B. Johnson, Columbia; second, J. S. Boyd, Pennsylvania; third, F. J. Pierkarski. Distance of winner, 41 feet 7¼ inches.

Pole Vault.—Won by W. Baird, Pennsylvania, height, 11 feet 5 inches; M. P. Fitzpatrick, Pennsylvania, and H. McLintock tied for second place at 10 feet 4 inches. On the toss Fitzpatrick won the prize and the 4 points were divided.

Running High Jump.—Won by M. Cornell of Columbia, height, 5 feet 5 inches; H. Crawford and K. J. Brown, Pennsylvania, tied for second place at 5 feet 3 inches.

Throwing the Hammer.—Won by H. Duden, Columbia, distance, 119 feet 9¾ inches; second, F. J. Pierkarski, Pennsylvania, distance, 116 feet 9¾ inches; third, E. S. Smith, Columbia, distance, 116 feet 6½ inches.

RUSSIA'S DEFIANCE.

The announcement that Russia has re-occupied Niu-Chwang and the forts at the mouth of the Liao, and the report that Russian troops have entered Korea, give a gravity to the situation in the Far East which it has not had before. The reoccupation and fortification of a treaty port in Manchuria which Russia had solemnly agreed to evacuate, and had, in fact, made a show of evacuating, must be interpreted as a defiance to the Powers at the instigation of which China refused the additional and outrageous demands suddenly sprung upon her by Russia as conditions precedent to Russia's performance of her solemn international obligations. The fact that it is China which now refuses the Russian demands puts Russia in a much worse position, diplomatically and internationally, than that which she would have occupied had she continued to bully or wheedle the Chinese authorities into conceding her demands. For it gives the Powers which are only indirectly, however really, affected by the fulfillment or non-fulfillment of treaty obligations between Russia and China a "locus standi" in the matter. The Chinese refusal of the Russian demands is a diplomatic defeat for Russia and a diplomatic success for the Powers which seek "not territory but trade," in and with the Chinese Empire and all its parts, of which the Province of Manchuria is one.

This is important to remember. It accounts, among other things, for the new outspokenness of our State Department, through the irresponsible but none the less authoritative outgivings it makes by way of The Associated Press. We are now, by the action of China and by the action of Russia, become, so to speak, a party of record in the action of Russia vs. China. One party to that action is injured, on its own showing, by the act of the other in a matter in which we have a National interest. But this is not the most serious aspect of the news. If Korea has in fact been invaded, then evidently the issue has been raised in express provision of which the Anglo-Japanese alliance was formed. It may very well be that Lord LANSDOWNE's declaration of a British Monroe Doctrine over the Persian Gulf has precipitated the Russian action. In any case, that action is a distinct defiance of that alliance.

The United States is not a party to that alliance, and recent Russian assurances may now be interpreted to have been meant to detach us from it. But, while we are not a party to it, it is no secret that our interests and our sympathies are wholly enlisted on the side of its objects. The recent and the present performances of Russia give us fair opportunity to "underwrite" the alliance, so to say. So that, for most practical purposes, Russia finds herself confronted with an Anglo-Japanese-American "entente." Against that combination we should say that it was an act of mere desperation for any other Power or any combination of other Powers to come into conflict on the Pacific Ocean or on its Asiatic coast.

THIS MONEY CENTRE.

The placing of the entire amount of the Mexican loan of $12,500,000 in the form of 4½ per cent. two-year Treasury notes through the house of SPEYER & Co. is another evidence of the gradual rise of New York as a money centre in the international sense. The process is not a sudden one. A year or two ago we hastily concluded that the transfer of the world's money centre from London to New York was as good as accomplished. We were mistaken. A supremacy held so long and so firmly is not to be challenged by any pretender without a course of preparation at once arduous and prolonged.

We have neglected to prepare ourselves in respect to one essential part of the equipment for transacting a world business in money. Our currency system is not what it should be, is, in fact, grievously defective in comparison with the currency systems of other countries of great financial transactions. In London they never have a money rate jumping about, as it jumps about sometimes in New York, all the way from 6 to 60 per cent., nor is the Paris money rate subject to such violent fluctuations. In either of these two great money centres a 5 or 6 per cent. rate would be considered startling.

In New York high and rapidly changing interest rates are not always startling, but they are invariably shameful. They are a disgrace to the country, to its statesmen, and to the party in power, whichever party that may be. It is a disgrace the possibility of which might be averted by a very simple enactment giving to our currency the quality of elasticity in such a manner that it would automatically expand or contract in conformity with the varying needs of business. With such a currency we should have no reason to be anxious about the demand for moving the crops. With such a currency we should be in a position to say, as our National wealth increases and loanable funds accumulate, that we were prepared to do the banking business of the world on reasonable terms.

THE USE OF THE WALKS.

The Chamber of Commerce has now an opportunity, which we doubt not it will improve, to render a substantial service to the business interests of the city.

It received on Thursday and referred to its Executive Committee a communication from Gen. GREENE, the Commissioner of Police, relating to the condition of the sidewalks, especially in the business sections of the city. This condition is bad from the point of view of the business men and from that of the general public, and, under the ordinances covering the subject, it is bound to get worse and worse. The handling of goods going into or out of warehouses, factories, and stores grows in difficulty as in volume with the steady and rapid growth of the city. It would do so, quite without reference to the corresponding demand for the use of the sidewalks by the increasing population. That increase, of course, still further complicates the task. With every addition to the extent of business, land becomes more expensive and the room necessary for the receipt and discharge of goods is harder to get. The old-fashioned mode of doing the business which still prevails in most sections, carrying everything across the sidewalk and often leaving goods on the walks awaiting either storing or delivery, though it was convenient once for shippers and not seriously inconvenient for the public, is now impracticable for both. As its disadvantages became evident and burdensome, the present drastic ordinances were passed to regulate it, or more correctly to forbid it.

These ordinances, which are all about twenty years old, could not now be strictly enforced without interrupting and in some instances nearly paralyzing traffic in some important branches of business. The policy that has prevailed in the recent past was to intrust the enforcement or non-enforcement of the ordinances to the police, which was about as bad a way of dealing with it as could be imagined, tending to corrupt the police and securing the rights and interests of neither the public nor the business men. Against the continuance of this policy Gen. GREENE is, of course, wholly opposed. The ordinances have been suspended for sixty days in a proper and legal manner. At the end of that term it will become his duty to apply them, and there is no doubt that he will do so, if in the meanwhile they are not changed. He appeals to the Chamber of Commerce, as the body representing the largest and most varied interests of business in the city, to take the matter up and help to devise a system of regulation that will be best, and will be practicable, for all concerned.

Probably this will involve some decided change in the present mode of handling goods in the line that has already been taken in some of the larger business places, where provision has been made for the entry of trucks to load and unload on the premises. This reduces the use of the walks to the passage of the teams and trucks across them, and under proper regulation this need not be objectionable. At any rate, objection would be removed as nearly as possible. Where this is found not to be feasible, on account of narrow room, it is possible that some mode of hoisting goods over the walk could be substituted, though this is obviously far less desirable than handling the goods wholly within the premises. The point to be urged on the business community is that an opportunity is now offered for studying this matter in connection with the officers of the City Government, acting in entire good faith, and making a plan that will secure the greatest benefit and the least inconvenience for all interests involved. If the committee of the Chamber of Commerce acts with the intelligence and energy usual in that organization, we have no doubt that a sound conclusion will be reached.

STOCK EXCHANGE MORALITY.

The revelations made in the suit of WILLIAM N. AMORY against President VREELAND of the Metropolitan Street Railway raise an important question of good morals for the consideration of the members of the Stock Exchange. Are such raids as have been attempted against Metropolitan within the past two months by the circulation of misleading reports and the employment of erroneous and damaging statements by alleged experts to be sanctioned as a legitimate or even permissible feature of Stock Exchange dealings? It is an important question, if they are to pass unrebuked by the Stock Exchange, whether the entire body of brokers will not suffer by the diminution of public confidence in the Exchange as a whole and in any particular securities which may hereafter be the subject of attack under the immunity thus assured.

The facts in regard to the Metropolitan case are pretty clear. More than a year ago Mr. JAMES R. KEENE received a visit from AMORY and listened to a story so preposterous regarding the finances of the Metropolitan Street Railway that it would have been rejected without examination by a man without special motive for entertaining it. Mr. AMORY frankly confessed in his testimony that he selected Mr. KEENE as a sympathetic listener to his narrative because he knew that the latter had a motive in antagonizing some of the gentlemen connected with Metropolitan interests. Mr. AMORY had his own motive, connected with his previous career. If he had lacked a motive, however, for pursuing a policy which would depress the value of Metropolitan stock, it was promptly furnished him when a payment of $2,500 in a lump sum was made, and a salary of $500 per month paid him to prosecute his investigations. This money was furnished, by the admissions made in testimony, to the amount of $6,400, to AMORY and about $1,900 to certain accountants, in order to make out a case against the Metropolitan.

AMORY secured the services of an accountant, who frankly admitted on the witness stand that in trying to show a deficit of $18,000,000 in the balance sheet of the Metropolitan he included all the liabilities of subsidiary companies, but excluded their assets. It was obvious that this sort of an exhibit would not sustain examination. An attempt to secure the indorsement of other New York accountants failed. An accountant was found in Baltimore, but he also "gave away" the purpose of the conspiracy on the witness stand by admitting that the inclusion of the assets of leased companies would have entirely reversed the calculated deficit. The Amory expert developed another significant feature of the conspiracy by the admission that he had doubts about the soundness of this form of accounting, but followed it upon the assurance of the lawyer employed by AMORY's employer that it was proper.

There are here all the elements of a deliberate conspiracy to depress the value of an important property and to mislead the shareholders, who were the owners of it, and the public, who might become owners by the purchase of the stock. If injustice were done by such combinations only to a few of the leaders of finance or to speculators in the market, it would still be true that these persons, like all others, are entitled to the protection of the law. But when the same injustice is extended to innocent holders of the property, it is possible that the Stock Exchange may deem it wise to take measures to protect itself against such combinations. This it can do under its rules. If these evil practices go unpunished, how can the Exchange hope to command the confidence of the investing public and maintain respect for the organization and the properties in which it deals both here at home and among investors abroad?

One case has recently been the subject of action by the committee of the Stock Exchange, but it is a case less flagrant in many respects than this of the Metropolitan, because in that case, while there was an absence of good faith on the part of the broker, there was not the deliberate formation of a conspiracy and the expenditure of money for the depression of the value of property. The Stock Exchange owes it to itself to maintain a reputation for honest dealing among its own members and with the investing public.

THE MILITIA AND THE UNIONS.

Gov. ODELL has signed the bill adding two new sections to the Penal Code, and designed to protect members of the National Guard from molestation or persecution by the trades unions. The additions to the Penal Code are reasonably drastic, but have terrors only for those who deem free riot essential to the attainment of the ends sought by organized labor. One section provides that a person who, either by himself or in co-operation with another, deprives a member of the National Guard of his employment or prevents his being employed, or obstructs or annoys him or his employer, or dissuades any one from joining the National Guard, is guilty of a misdemeanor. The second section is even more specific:

> No association or corporation, constituted or organized for the purpose of promoting the success of the trade, employment, or business of the members thereof, shall by any constitution, rule, by-law, resolution, vote, or regulation discriminate against any member of the National Guard of the State of New York, because of such membership, in respect of the eligibility of such member of the said National Guard to membership in such association or corporation, or in respect of his right to retain said last-mentioned membership; it being the purpose of this section and the section immediately preceding to protect a member of the said National Guard from disadvantage in his means of livelihood and liberty therein, but not to give him any preference or advantage on account of his membership of said National Guard. A person who aids in enforcing any such provisions against a member of the said National Guard, with the intent to discriminate against him because of such membership, is guilty of a misdemeanor.

The first section scarcely admits of effective enforcement; the second is readily enforcible. No doubt it will be denounced as legislation instigated by the capitalist class and in their interest, and it will be held up to contumely and abuse as an invasion of the sacred right of labor to determine the qualifications of those desirous of becoming members of their organizations. This has the advantage that the more the labor leaders talk in this way the more evident will be their desire to make service in the National Guard unpopular and to withdraw all who are controlled by the labor leaders from the patriotic service of the State and the protection of life and property. Meanwhile, the restraint upon this sort of pernicious activity is wholesome. The enactment referred to expresses the will of the people of the State of New York, and those who commit the misdemeanor it defines will incur the penalty. The Potter incident will not be repeated in this State.

THE WORLD'S ANNIVERSARY.

When Mr. JOSEPH PULITZER bought The World newspaper twenty years ago he wrote in his inaugural article: "Performance is better than promise. Exuberant assurances are cheap. I make none. I simply refer the public to the new World itself, which henceforth shall be the daily evidence of its own growing improvement, with forty-eight daily witnesses in its forty-eight columns."

There is no doubt that the public in large numbers has consented to be referred to The World under Mr. PULITZER's direction, and in looking back over his twenty years of pretty active participation in the daily activities, efforts, and strifes of the newspaper vocation the owner of The World may permit himself to point with pardonable pride to quite other witnesses than the columns of The World itself. There are public achievements to be set to the credit of The World, battles fought and won, reforms initiated or helped on, and a public opinion created among its large body of readers. At the very beginning Mr. PULITZER said that his newspaper would be "dedicated to the cause of the people rather than that of purse-potentates." It will not be disputed that this promise has been faithfully kept, and if in the keeping of it Mr. PULITZER has himself become a purse-potentate it may be urged in palliation that he became one, if not by inadvertence, at least quite incidentally. The contents of the purse may be considered, as it were, a sort of by-product of the business of serving the cause of the people.

The methods by which Mr. PULITZER has built up the circulation and influence of The World were, of course, somewhat of an innovation, differing often in a most startling manner from the practices of the older journalism. But his method was successful, tremendously so, and it has been widely imitated—two facts which must be held to prove that a considerable fraction of the people of the United States were ready for it; and not of the United States alone, for in London and Paris practitioners of the newer school have come to the fore in recent years. But whatever may be said of the ways of The World it will be universally admitted that it has "done the State some service," and has fought with notable vigor and unflagging zeal for the triumph of many good causes.

TOPICS OF THE TIMES.

—Senator BLACKBURN of Kentucky is quoted as describing the mountaineers of his State as "the most incomprehensible people in the world," a phrase which not only sins by comparing an incomparable adjective, but also reveals that the Senator has never given any careful attention to the history or peculiarities of his troublesome neighbors, and thereby points straight, if not to the reason why the mountaineers are what they are, at least to the reason why they are allowed to remain so—the fact that the reputable people of the State have stood afar off and left them to struggle unaided with isolation, poverty, and ignorance. The mountaineers are uncomprehended, not incomprehensible, for they show precisely the traits that everywhere develop from conditions like theirs, and both their vices and their virtues are exactly duplicated in dozens of places in this country and in nobody knows how many elsewhere. Senator BLACKBURN says that he "cannot see any remedy except time," and he believes that they will not stop their fighting while any of them are left alive. In reality, there are several remedies of demonstrated efficacy, and the system of cowardly assassination which the Senator miscalls fighting will cease as soon as the region is provided with officials with the courage and the inclination to enforce the law. This would involve at first a little real fighting in the open, of a kind vehemently disliked by habitual bearers of concealed weapons, whether they live on high land or low, but it would cause only a slight decrease in the mountain population, and the result would be the prompt and permanent end of a state of affairs that is a disgrace to Kentucky in particular and to the United States in general. Between extermination as dangerous vermin and reformation into an approach to civilized men the mountaineers would not be slow to make a choice if the alternative were presented to them with sufficient sternness. If other means were deemed too harsh, Kentucky might try wholesale expulsion, the admirable though much calumniated method by which Great Britain, with some energetic and intelligent help from New England, once cleared Acadia of a population very like that of Breathitt County.

—With the return to use of the open cars on surface and elevated roads, the newspapers are again beginning to receive many, and to publish not a few, letters filled with angry denunciation of those who, not too elegantly, are described as "end-seat hogs." Now is it a fact that a person who, finding an end seat empty, takes and keeps it, deserves an appellation so contemptuously severe? We very much doubt it. In the first place, nobody is expected to crowd his way by other people to a remoter seat if one at or near the outer end is empty, and if the bench has any occupants at all he is fully justified in taking the nearest seat. In the second place, the person who is going to or near the end of the route consults his own comfort by getting as far from the end seat as he can, and always does it. In the third place, the person entering a car has a right to assume that those boarding it after he does will, as a rule, ride further than he will, and that they will therefore suffer no more from crowding by him when they come than they would from his crowding by them when he goes. Lastly, the end seat is pleasanter than the others, and in a public conveyance the principle of "first come, best served" is recognized the world over—with due modifications, of course, by the courteous and obliging. Everything considered, we incline to the belief that the people who rage at the "end-seat hog" do so chiefly because he takes a seat they want for themselves, and that, if fortune favored them, they would be as prompt as anybody else to commit the act they denounce. The man who takes and keeps the end seat inconveniences nobody either when he arrives nor when he departs, and such annoyance as he causes between the two would have been caused by another if he didn't do it, and is much more the fault of the railway company than of himself, anyway. If cars were built with regard for the comfort of passengers instead of for the profits of stockholders there would be no crowding for which, either justly or unjustly, the man on the end seat—who is a woman as often as otherwise—could be held responsible by the angry correspondents.

—What do folks mean when they say "he made no bones" or doing this or that? The expression is in frequent use, and, when used, is always understood, but the more one thinks about it the more puzzling it becomes, and questioning will reveal curious differences of opinion as to whether the things about or of which no bones are made are or are not in some degree wicked, impudent, or reckless. The dictionaries do little more than admit the existence of the expression as a colloquialism, with the definition of "without objection or scruple." That definition hints at the implication of reprehension, but it reveals nothing as to origin. There is, however, an old and now disused verb "to bone," with significant variants of "born" and "bourn," that was once used by mechanics like carpenters and masons and meant to take a sight or level along a piece of work. Perhaps, therefore, the man who "makes no bones" of a thing is one who does it without seeing that he is right before he goes ahead—without examining its character and consequences. This theory has certain merits, but it is unsatisfactory and inadequate, and he who makes no bones about rejecting it will be in little danger.

—That particularly strenuous and equally efficient officer, Capt. JOHN J. PERSHING, continues to impress his personality upon the Moros in a way that must convince them that times have changed since the days when the only white men they knew were more than content to let them alone on few other conditions than that of being let alone in turn. Capt. PERSHING has different ideas and carries them out in gay disregard of the ancient legends that the Moros are a very terrible people and invincible on their own ground. With almost no losses among his own men, he attacks and defeats them whenever necessity—or is it opportunity?—to do so arises, and after each battle he offers peace and friendship. The Moros will accept these offers after a while, for refusal has proved to be very wearing on the resources of the tribe. Capt. PERSHING, it is worth noting, is a product of West Point. He went to the Military Academy from Missouri in 1882, was a Second Lieutenant in the Sixth Cavalry in 1886, a First Lieutenant in the Tenth Cavalry in 1892, received his Captaincy in 1901, and was transferred from the First to the Fifteenth Cavalry last year. From 1898 to the June of 1901 he was in the volunteer service with the rank of Major. He has, therefore, had time enough to learn his business of soldiering with great thoroughness, and he is credited with no less discretion than courage.

MR. CANTOR AND MR. STEWART.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

THE TIMES in its editorial of Friday morning hits the nail squarely on the head when it suggests that some explanation is due the public from either Mr. Stewart or Mr. Cantor regarding the former's removal from the head of the Building Department. How can Mr. Cantor make any further remarks regarding his action in face of his statements that he removed Mr. Stewart when he considered him a competent and efficient official, yet could not stand the pressure that had been brought to bear on the matter? It cannot be expected that Mr. Cantor will ever reveal the real reason for his action and explain what is this influence of which he speaks.

It might be interesting to know, however, something of Mr. Cantor's relations with a certain realty and construction company which has lately, within a few days, announced building operations of $5,000,000. It would also be interesting to hear why this company worked so hard for the appointment of Mr. Stewart and then just as hard for his removal. Mr. Cantor, if he could have induced Mr. Stewart to resign, would not be called upon to make any explanation, but much to his regret, such was not the case. Mr. Stewart refused to resign, and had to be removed. Mr. Cantor did remove him, and as it now seems to his own discredit, for it has brought to the public attention the very thing he did not wish. It looks to those acquainted with the situation very much like placing a city department under the control of a corporation.

Mr. Stewart again takes his place in private life, having been a faithful and fearless public servant, and having sacrificed his own interest for that of the public good—a true reformer. His record speaks for him—removed because honest. It is unnecessary to say more.

"INDEPENDENT DEMOCRAT."

MAN AND TOBACCO.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

The question of smoking upon open cars hardly deserves the attention it is receiving, but the unreasoning protest of "Justice" in your columns recently requires a moment's notice.

Is it not to conserve the "rights" of the non-smokers that special provision is made for the smokers so that any intrusion upon the sensibilities of the former may be avoided?

As to "those who are slaves to nasty, stinking tobacco," let me suggest a thought that may never have occurred to "Justice." Nature provided in abundance that which she intended to be freely used. Tobacco grows abundantly and naturally in many parts of the world. As no animal except man makes a general use of it, it would seem that nature intended it for his use, and that to an extent limited only by his taste and means for procuring it.

THE STEADY, SILENT ONES.

S. E. KISER in Chicago Record-Herald.

The roar of the storm is fierce and loud,
It lashes and crashes and rips and tears;
The water is dashed against the pane,
But after the blustering, what is the gain,
What good has been wrought in the world's affairs?

The warm, sweet drizzle that comes along
And quietly busies itself all day
Helps the sprouts to push through the softened ground,
And with never a roar or a fearful sound
Does the work that the loud storm never may.

It isn't the blunter, the noise, that counts
In the fields or out with the busy throng;
The sweating man, like the storms that roar
The steady and silent ones must care

PRICES IN GREAT BRITAIN.

Almost All Articles Higher in 1902—Comment on the Conditions in the United States.

WASHINGTON, May 8.—It appears that high prices are quite as much the rule in Great Britain as in the United States at the present time. Prof. Sauerbeck's annual statement, "Prices of Commodities," published in The Journal of the British Royal Statistical Society, for March 31, 1903, just received by the Treasury Bureau of Statistics, show high prices in foodstuffs, in iron, and in textiles during 1902.

The statement begins with a series of "index number" tables, showing index prices for groups of articles from 1846 to 1902. The index number for the group designated "vegetable food" stands at 69 for the year 1902, against 60 in 1899, and 58 in 1896; that for "animal food" at 97 in 1902, against 77 in 1896, and 76 in 1896; that for "minerals" at 82 in 1902, against 70 in 1896, and 68 in 1895; that for "textiles" at 61 in 1902, against 57 in 1899, and 58 in 1896; and the number for "sundry materials" stands at 71 in 1902, against 63 in 1896, and 62 in 1897.

"Meat was dear during the greater part of the year," says the statement, "and beef ruled in June and July higher than at any time since 1880."

Commenting upon conditions in America, the report says: "The United States has again occupied an exceptional position. If a year ago fears were expressed that the state of affairs there was not free from danger, it must now be admitted that they were premature, as the marvelous prosperity has continued unabated to the present day. American securities had another boom, and though a reaction followed, the last prices still occupy a high level. It is estimated that the iron production of the States reached the enormous total of 17,000,000 tons, and even this was insufficient for requirements."

Of the prospects for 1903, the report says: "The prospects for the present year are, if anything, a little more hopeful. Adverse points in this country are still high taxation, undigested Government loans, and high prices of meat, but the corn crops of the world were plentiful, the development in South Africa will no doubt be important, the condition in Australia is improving, and it is not improbable that the trade to the Plate and also to the Argentine Republic will also increase. In Germany the period of liquidation seems to be coming to an end, and a return of confidence may be near at hand, but the recovery after the serious depression will naturally be a slow one.

"Much will depend upon the United States. Continued activity will benefit Europe as well, while a sudden break would cause a stoppage of American demand and perhaps a flood of American products into Europe."

TRUSTS MAY ANTAGONIZE DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE.

Chairman Jenkins of House Judiciary Committee Points Out How the Law Could Be Evaded.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, May 8.—Mr. Jenkins of Wisconsin, who was Chairman of the House Judiciary Committee in the last Congress and is likely to be at the head of that important committee in the Fifty-eighth Congress, says the effect on trusts and combinations of the operations of the law creating the Department of Commerce is problematical. The question of the formation of the bureaus of that department was not considered from a legal standpoint by the House committee.

"They were never," said Mr. Jenkins, "the subject of discussion by the Judiciary Committee, as the bill creating the new department came from the Commerce Committee. While it is hard to tell what will be the outcome of the operation of these bureaus, and particularly that of the Bureau of Corporations, there is little doubt that the exercise of the latter's functions will be tested in the courts. It can readily be seen that a corporation created under a State law might resent the interference of the Federal authority on Constitutional grounds. All of these questions must necessarily depend on the line of inquiry decided on by the new bureau.

"It is easy to figure out how a corporation engaging in inter-State commerce might avoid disclosing the extent of its business if it so desired. It might do all this business by selling its product to an individual in its own State, this individual to do the selling in other States. This would not be an impossible or difficult method of doing business, and would entirely avoid disclosures to the Federal authorities if the corporation deemed it advisable to avoid such disclosures."

Mr. Jenkins does not believe that it is the province of the Federal Government to place restrictions on commerce between the States. He quotes Madison as saying that the Federal duty in this respect is to make commerce absolutely free between the States.

In discussing the merger decision Mr. Jenkins advanced the theory that if the agreement which constituted the Northern Securities Company had made no stipulations which might be construed as a restraint upon inter-State commerce it would have withstood the Federal courts. He is of opinion that a contract which would bring them under one management might be drawn which would not be a violation of the inter-State commerce law on the ground that it was made in restraint of trade.

Mr. Jenkins believes that the anti-rebate law will accomplish better results than any other of the anti-trust measures. In all of the legislation of the Winter Mr. Jenkins sees no way for the Government to effectually place a restraining hand on the coal trust of the anthracite region. He maintains that his proposition for a Congressional investigation of the coal trust should have been made for the purpose of ascertaining whether a conspiracy did not exist, in which event the Government should have taken the mines and operated them. There is no doubt in the mind of Mr. Jenkins of the Constitutional authority for such a course.

THE BALDWIN "INTERVIEW."

Findings of Col. Mills, Exonerating the General, Made Public Together with Mr. Root's Indorsement.

WASHINGTON, May 8.—The War Department to-day made public the report of Col. Mills on the alleged interview with Gen. Baldwin at Denver, together with the indorsement of Secretary Root. The findings have been made public. The report deals with the methods of the different newspapers in Denver, and pronounces the interview in which Gen. Baldwin is alleged to have criticised the Filipinos and negroes "a fake." Col. Mills also says:

> I found Gen. Baldwin much chagrined at the notoriety thrust upon him by this newspaper episode, and greatly humiliated at the thought that any one would believe him guilty of the utterances alleged in these newspaper articles; that any one could believe him so poor a soldier as to be indifferent to the lives of the men he commanded was to him a source of deep regret.

> War Department,
> Washington, May 8, 1903.

It appears by this very exhaustive investigation, in which testimony was taken under oath by a duly authorized officer, that the publication ascribing to Gen. Baldwin statements reflecting upon the Filipino soldiers in the service of the United States, and also upon the negro soldiers of the United States, was false; that no such statements were made by him. The papers accompanying the report of the Inspector General leave no doubt in my mind as to the correctness of his conclusions. The report and papers will be filed without further action.

ELIHU ROOT, Secretary of War.

LENIENCY FOR ARMY OFFICER.

Lieut. Faulkner's Resignation Accepted —Lieut. McCarthy Will Be Court-Martialed.

WASHINGTON, May 8.—Secretary of War Root has accepted the resignation of First Lieut. Charles P. Faulkner of the Eighth Infantry, indorsing his action "for the good of the service." Faulkner while serving in Alaska was charged with misappropriating funds belonging to enlisted men, and also with failing to report the fact to his superior officers. The money losses were made good by the young man's father, ex-Senator Faulkner of West Virginia. Lieutenant was known because of the good record of the officer in the Philippines.

The Secretary has approved a court-martial in the case of Lieut. F. McCarthy of the Nineteenth Infantry. He is charged with duplicating his pay accounts and who tendered his resignation. McCarthy is under arrest at Fort Leavenworth.

PRESERVING MANILA'S WALLS.

WASHINGTON, May 8.—The proposed destruction of the walls about the City of Manila has brought out a protest from a number of patriotic societies in this country, and after considering the matter, Secretary Root has given instructions to Gov. Taft not to disturb the walls. The removal of only a small portion of the wall at one place where commerce would be benefited was contemplated, but even to this Secretary Root objects.

Manila is now the only "walled city" in the Orient, and it is Secretary Root's intention to have it preserved. It is quite likely that the moat outside the wall will be filled up as a sanitary measure.

MR. CLEVELAND'S POPULARITY.

WASHINGTON, May 8.—Ex-Senator Lindsay of Kentucky, a member of the National Commission on the Louisiana Purchase Exposition, has returned to Washington from St. Louis, where he took a prominent part in the dedication ceremonies. Mr. Lindsay was present at all the functions at St. Louis and had abundant opportunity of observing events and forming judgment upon them. When asked for his opinion with regard to the popular demonstrations favorable to Mr. Cleveland Mr. Lindsay said:

"I did not hear the probability or the possibility of Mr. Cleveland's nomination discussed. I think the reception he received was purely a personal tribute to him. It was a public manifestation of the reaction of public sentiment in favor of Mr. Cleveland as a representative American and statesman.

"If his friends conclude to press him to take the nomination for President and he consents to run, he will certainly receive the support of all the old-fashioned and many of the new fashioned Democrats. But I do not think any one can now estimate how far Bryan and his followers, and those who indorsed, or professed to indorse, the Chicago and Kansas City platforms will be able to control the next Democratic National Convention.

"The political phase of Mr. Cleveland's restoration to public favor seems to me to have reached greater importance in the East than in the West, just as the personal tribute to him has been greater in the West than in the East. In my opinion it is too soon to speculate upon who the Democratic candidate will be. We have yet to determine whether the Democratic Party can be reunited on principles and policies that will command public confidence."

D. B. HILL OPPOSED TO MR. CLEVELAND.

ALBANY, May 8.—Statements that ex-Senator David B. Hill is in favor of the nomination of Grover Cleveland for President by the Democrats next year were effectually set at rest here to-day. In fact, it came out that he was strongly opposed to the idea.

Deputy Attorney General Charles N. Bulger arrived in Albany to-day from his home in Oswego and was besieged by friends who were desirous of learning whether the alleged interview with him, in which he was quoted as saying that Mr. Cleveland was the strongest man the Democrats could nominate for President, and would have the cordial support of Mr. Hill, was authentic.

"Never said it," declared Mr. Bulger with emphasis. "It is altogether too early to talk about candidates, besides I have made it a point not to talk on National issues. I would not think of speaking for Mr. Hill on such a matter."

Mr. Hill was not at his office to-day, and it was announced that he would not come to town during the day; he was engaged in "farming."

A visit to Wolfert's Roost discovered Mr. Hill busily engaged in directing the operations of a man with a plow. He was shown the reputed interview with Judge Bulger, and asked what he had to say about it.

"It is a fine day for farming, isn't it?" he replied.

While Mr. Hill declined to talk for publication, his friends say that his view of Mr. Cleveland's candidacy was entirely misrepresented in the alleged interview. According to their statement, Mr. Hill, while entertaining the most cordial sentiments toward Mr. Cleveland and being most grateful to him for the assistance which he gave the New York State Democracy in the last Gubernatorial campaign, regards Mr. Cleveland as an impossible candidate.

He is inclined to think, it is said, that the persons who are now booming Mr. Cleveland for a third term are actuated by the motives he ascribes to those who opposed in the Parker boom after they had learned of Judge Parker's unwillingness to become a candidate for Governor—that is, that they are merely seeking an excuse for supporting the Republican ticket. They will make Cleveland's rejection, it is claimed, their reason for supporting Mr. Roosevelt, just as they made the failure of the State Convention to nominate Judge Parker their excuse for supporting Mr. Odell.

Mr. Hill, it is said, has but one idea on National politics at this time, and that is harmony. Unless harmony can be secured he does not think it matters much who the candidate is.

CREED REVISION FAVORED.

PHILADELPHIA, May 8.—The Rev. Dr. William H. Roberts, Stated Clerk of the Presbyterian General Assembly, has received returns from 206 of the 237 Presbyteries on the question of creed revision. Eleven overtures were sent to the Presbyteries by the last General Assembly. Of the returns received, 185 are in favor of all the overtures, 13 are partly affirmative, 2 are negative, and 6 took no action.

This vote ratifies the proposition, which required a majority of two-thirds of the Presbyteries, and practically assures the adoption of the revised Confession of Faith by the General Assembly, which meets in Los Angeles this month.

BAY STATE BRIBERY SCANDAL.

Massachusetts Senate Will Investigate Charges Made by George J. Raymond of Boston.

BOSTON, May 8.—The Committee on Rules of the Massachusetts Senate this afternoon decided to report to that body resolutions of the Senate to investigate charges of bribery made by George J. Raymond of Boston.

A charge was made by Mr. Raymond that a Senator last year offered to prevent the passage of a bill which affected Mr. Raymond's business for a money consideration. The Committee on Rules considered the matter and reported that as the alleged bribery had to do with a member of last year's Senate the committee had no jurisdiction and the investigation was not within its power. Mr. Raymond made a public statement to-day that the Senator to whom he referred was a member of the present Legislature as well as of the last one, and the committee decided to investigate.

The resolution was reported at the afternoon session, and was unanimously adopted. President Jones named the following members as an Investigating Committee:

PRESIDENT IN LOS ANGELES

Enthusiastic Crowds Welcome Him at Every Stopping Place on His Tour of California.

LOS ANGELES, Cal., May 8.—President Roosevelt made his entry into Los Angeles at 1 o'clock this afternoon. The enthusiastic welcome that has greeted him at each stopping place within the boundary of California reached a climax when the special train drew into La Grande Station. Los Angeles had for many days been preparing for him, and she was ready, dressed in her best.

The Presidential train left Riverside this morning at an early hour when thousands of people turned out to bid the President good-bye. On the way over the Santa Fé a half hour's stop was made at Claremont, where the President spoke to the students of Pomona College, the President of which, John D. Gates, is an old-time friend of Mr. Roosevelt.

"Mr. President, Men, and Women: Even in a distinctly college and school gathering I know you will not grudge my saying my first words of greeting to those whom, before all others, we honor for what they did, to those because of whom we have a country, a President, or any method of moving forward along the path of greatness, the men of the Grand Army. I always envy you men of the Grand Army, because you do not have to preach; you practiced. All we have got to do is to try to come up to the standard in peace which you set alike in war and in peace.

"It is a very good combination to have the red with the white and the blue. You can see from the flag afterward, which is my college, has the red, and then comes the blue and white of yours. It did me good to get into a circle of higher education, and, listening to you, I thought at once of football. My friends and fellow-citizens, it is such a pleasure to be in this college town to-day."

In view of the activities of a college life, and the necessity for physical training, the President said:

"There is not much need of educating the body if one pursues certain occupations, but the minute that you come to the people who pursue sedentary lives there is a great need for educating the body. All of us recognize that, if we come to think of it. The man that is the ideal good citizen is the man who, in the event of trial, in the event of a call from his country, can respond to that call as you responded in the great war. When that call comes you need not only fiery enthusiasm, but you need the body containing that fiery enthusiasm to be sufficiently hardy to bear it up.

"Every college should aim from its intellectual side to add to the sum of productive scholarship of the Nation. And I trust that this college—all colleges like this—will add to the purely American scholarship. By purely American I mean that you should turn your attention to the thing that you find naturally at hand or to which your minds naturally turn, and try in dealing with that to deal in so fresh a way that the net income shall be an addition to the world's stock of wisdom and knowledge. And every college should strive to develop among the students the capacity to do good, original work. I like the chance of being one of such a gathering as this, because it is a good augury for the Republic to see in this mighty Western State—this typically American State—the things of the body and things of the soul equally cared for. I greet and thank you."

From Claremont the train ran through the picturesque San Gabriel Valley to Pasadena, where a stop of two hours was made. Pasadena, famous for its beautiful homes, had been elaborately decorated. All the business houses and residences on the route over which the President was driven displayed American flags and bunting. On the way to the Wilson High School, where the President delivered a short speech, he passed under a floral archway which extended for two blocks on Marengo Avenue. The front of the archway was a solid mass of flowers from base to top, with festoons of varicolored roses draped across from curb to curb. Baskets of flowers on smilax swung ropes extended from the windows of the High School buildings, and solid banks of roses covered the walls of the façade from base to cupola.

As the President passed the Elks Lodge building Congressman McLachlan presented him with a gold key, a fac simile of one which opens the Elks' lodgeroom. Reaching the school Mayor Vedder briefly introduced Congressman McLachlan, who presented the President to an immense crowd, saying:

"Here is a man whose sympathies are as broad as this great Republic, and his daily life is an open book that is an inspiration to us all to a more ennobling citizenship."

After the address at the High School President Roosevelt and party took carriages for a drive through the city. The route took them down the famous orange grove avenues of millionaires' terraces. A brief stop was made at the home of Mrs. Garfield, the widow of President James A. Garfield, with whom the President chatted pleasantly for a few moments.

Continuing the drive, the party passed down Columbia Street to Raymond Hill, from which point the President gained a splendid view of the fertile San Gabriel Valley. Promptly at 12:30 the party boarded a train at Raymond Station and left for Los Angeles. When the train pulled in at La Grande Station, Los Angeles, thousands of people blocked the streets in the vicinity. Ex-members of the Rough Rider Regiment, a detachment of Troop D, N. G. C., and a political club of prominent Los Angeles business men, wearing the Rough Rider uniform, formed on either side of the platform when the President and party alighted.

The President entered the carriage with Gov. Pardee, Secretary Moody, and Private Secretary Loeb, and, attended by a platoon of mounted police and the soldiers, was driven directly to the Westminster Hotel, where luncheon was served.

From the station to the hotel crowds vented the enthusiasm that had been pent up during the preparations for the coming of the President.

In addition to the vigilance of the secret service men, the Los Angeles police force adopted stringent measures against the encroachment of the crowd. Westminster Hotel was surrounded by a cordon of police and plain clothes officers. A rope was drawn around the hotel and no one except those holding passes was admitted.

The annual fiesta de las flores, the chief feature of which is the elaborate floral parade, was arranged this year to coincide with the visit of the President. The parade occurred this afternoon, and was reviewed by the President and party.

UNION TO MR. ROOSEVELT.

Telegraphic Complaint Made That the Postal Authorities Have Aided Employers in Railway Strikes.

PITTSBURG, May 8.—As the result of a resolution passed to-night at the final session of the convention of the Amalgamated Association of Street Railway Employes a telegram was sent to President Roosevelt, asking him to intervene to prevent the unlawful use of the United States postal system to hurt this union.

Grievances were brought up by delegates because of the manner in which the United States mails were used in San Francisco and New Orleans during the time that the street car men were having trouble with their employers on account of organizing divisions of the union.

It was asserted that in San Francisco the letters of the street car men were held up, that some letters were opened and photographs were taken of the contents, and in many cases these photographs were posted by the employers at the various car barns. This was done, it is alleged, in order to deter employes from joining the unions. In New Orleans similar methods were practiced.

It was also charged that during strikes street railway companies placed United States mail signs on cars not carrying mail, contrary to the ruling of the Postmaster General, for the purpose of coercing the employes.

THE FUSION CONFERENCE.

German-American Reform Union Will Not Be Represented.

The wishes of Senator Thomas C. Platt will, it is expected, prevail at the Fusion conference, to be held at the Citizens' Union headquarters, 84 Union Square East, on Monday night. Nothing will be done about possible candidates.

The German-American Reform Union will not be represented. The Greater New York Democracy has selected a committee of conference, and the Republican organizations will elect conferees to-night.

The Executive Committee of the Citizens' Union did not meet last night, as expected, and many members of the organization attended a dinner given by Secretary Thomas A. Fulton to the district secretaries at the Café Boulevard, on Second Avenue.

PLAYS FOR WELLESLEY GIRLS.

"Everyman" and "The Sad Shepherd" to be Performed.

WELLESLEY, Mass., May 8.—The Department of English Literature of Wellesley College has arranged for an out-of-door performance on May 29 of the morality play "Everyman," and of Ben Johnson's pastoral "The Sad Shepherd." "Everyman" is to be given in the afternoon and "The Sad Shepherd" in the evening.

There is a great interest in both plays, as "Everyman" was recently given in Boston, and more particularly as it is said that there is record of but one performance of "The Sad Shepherd," that given by the Elizabethan Stage Society in the Quadrangle of Fulham Palace, July 23, 1898.

BARNARD STUDENTS' PLAY.

Several Members of the Sophomore Class in Male Attire.

The annual sophomore show at Barnard College was given yesterday in Brinckerhoff Theatre. The room was crowded with friends of the young women, but no one present knew what play was to be given, as the name had been guarded as a secret.

"The Taming of the Shrew" was presented. Men were not admitted to the performance, because the young women who took men's parts in the production were in male attire.

Vincentio	C. F. Dorian
Lucentio	C. T. Dorian
Petruchio	C. M. Farrelly
Gremio	A. V. Bailey
Hortensio	C. C. Bailey

Grumio	A. M. Rheinstein
Curtis	E. L. Levy

ACTORS' HOME ANNIVERSARY.

The first anniversary of the Actors' Home, in Brooks Avenue, West Brighton, was celebrated yesterday afternoon with appropriate exercises. More than 600 actresses, actors, and residents from near-by cities were present.

Daniel Frohman, who is acting President of the home, made the opening address. Joseph Jefferson, who opened the home a year ago with an address, spoke at length on its good work. The exercises closed with remarks by F. F. Mathey. At the present time there are forty-two retired actresses and actors living at the home.

STUART ROBSON'S ESTATE.

Letters of administration were granted yesterday by Surrogate Thomas to Mrs. Mary Dougherty Stuart, covering the estate of Henry M. Stuart, known on the stage as Stuart Robson, and who died at the Savoy Hotel on the night of April 29. Mrs. Stuart was known by her stage name of Miss May Waldron before her marriage to Mr. Robson and also during her professional appearances afterward.

In the petition for the letters of administration, which was presented by Leon Laski as attorney, it was shown that the estate left by Mr. Robson as the result of his fifty-three years of continuous service on the stage amounted to less than $35,000, and consisted of moneys on deposit at the United National Bank and in the Union Dime Savings Bank, together with bank stocks, especially that of the United National Bank. At the time of Mr. Robson's death it was thought there was a will, but none could be found.

NOTES OF THE THEATRE.

The twenty-fifth anniversary of Herman Korn as a stage manager will be celebrated in Terrace Garden on Tuesday evening. For the last thirteen years Mr. Korn has been connected with the Irving Place Theatre. Gustav von Seifertitz, leading man, and Franz Kiersehner, comedian, of Mr. Conried's forces, have arranged the programme.

***

Arrangements have just been concluded by which Ethel Levey and Sam Bernard are to be co-stars next season in the play which has been written for them by George Cohan. The production will be under the direction of T. D. Marks. Mr. Marks, who will sail for Europe on the Philadelphia May 13, will purchase in Paris and London costumes and other properties for the production.

***

The costumes for the Spanish play which Harrison Grey Fiske will produce at the Manhattan Theatre early next Autumn are being made at the Hidalgo Theatre in the City of Mexico, under the direction of Escanera, the Catalonian costumer. In the dressing this production will bear very little resemblance to the Spanish costumes usually seen on the stage, as the picturesque costumes of Catalonia, the scene of the play, that are practically unknown to the theatre, will be reproduced with fidelity.

New Theatre for the Bronx.

Plans have just been completed for a first-class theatre to be erected in the Bronx at a cost of $75,000. The theatre will be at the northeast corner of One Hundred and Forty-seventh Street and Bergen Avenue, and will have a seating capacity of 2,000. It is being backed by Benjamin B. Irving and William H. Alden. In connection with it there will be a roof garden and a ratskeller.

CHICAGO TRACTION PLAN.

Special to The New York Times.

CHICAGO, May 8.—The terms under which the Union Traction Company is to be reorganized after its receivership troubles are ended are gradually being outlined. The complete plan cannot be given until R. R. Govin returns from New York, where it is now being discussed, but in a general way the following is now known in Chicago:

Renewals of the franchise for the North and West Side systems will be asked in the names of the North and West Chicago Street Railway Companies.

The Union Traction Company, if that name is retained, will maintain its present position as a leasing and operating company. As rent for the properties it will agree to pay fixed dividends on the North and West Chicago stock, probably 8 per cent. for the North Side and 4 per cent. for the West, as well as assuming all existing bond and other obligations.

In return the Union Traction Company will agree to raise the necessary money, estimated as something over $23,000,000, to rebuild and re-equip the lines, and furnish the character of transportation the city will require as a condition of the renewal of the franchise.

What will be done with the Union Traction Company in order to place it on a financial basis where it can carry out the plan outlined is a matter now being gone over in New York. The general opinion in Chicago is that it means a wiping out of the common stock of that company to make room for the bonds or stock which will have to be floated to raise the money for the needed improvements.

The reasons for seeking a renewal of the franchise in the names of the old North and West Chicago Companies are twofold. In the first place, it will be an assurance to the stockholders that no attempt is to be made to take the property out of their hands, and, in the second, it is said, is cannot well be done in any other way.

WHAT IS DOING IN SOCIETY.

With the coaching parade, the races at Morris Park, and the many dancing trips, to-day will be very gay. DELAYED WEDDING NOTICE.

Society folk of the Hill "set" in Brooklyn were surprised yesterday by an announcement to the effect that young Farley Carter Childs had become a benedict—that he had, in fact, forsaken bachelorhood seven months ago. Mr. Childs, who is about twenty-two years old, lives at 55 Downing Street. He is a son of W. Ward Childs, Secretary of the American Manufacturing Company at 65 Wall Street, and President of the Southern Society of Brooklyn.

Young Mr. Childs's bride was Miss Sara Bartlo Hallock of Brooklyn, and it was said that the marriage took place on Oct. last. W. Ward Childs said yesterday that there had been no objection to the marriage on the part of the parents, but that it was thought that the young people should wait until they had become a little older. They are living with Mr. Childs's parents.

IN THE SHOPS.

Dog collar effects in jewelry are used not only for collars but for belts and bracelets. One belt has big medallions of turquois matrix and baroque pearls. There are jewaled pieces to slip over a band of velvet for a collar, and there are collars all of gold and jewels in open-work designs. One pretty one has topazes and baroque pearls. Bracelets are of the same style, a simple, open, cross pattern of gold and jewels, that is different from the linked jewels that are seen in other flexible bracelets.

Many of the little pins in enamel that are used for children are useful for young girls and also for older people, in holding laces in place. Among the simplest and prettiest are those in white enamel, a long narrow oval, linked one pin to another by fine chains of gold. There are three pins in a set, or sometimes two. Occasionally a stone is in the centre of the oval, raising the price but not the beauty of the pin. Pretty little pins in similar style are of pale blue, and there are, of course, always the gold pins.

***

One of the realistic stick pins is a pink-tinted (probably intended to give a bone color) skull, with small diamonds for eyes. Another skull has a small ring in the top of the head, so that it may be worn as a pendant.

***

***

Borders and cornices come with all kinds of paper to finish the corners of the room or to form into panels. They are frequently in floral designs.

***

***

Attractive tabourettes of teakwood have the supports of elaborately carved teakwood, and the top, not in a solid piece of marble, but pieces of marble in designs of several teakwood rings.

***

The interesting inlaid metal shields for decorative purposes are comparatively inexpensive. They can be bought for from $15 to $30.

***

A little cannon, very realistic in appearance, is a pea shooter for the small boy, and it costs only 10 cents.

***

A sideboard large enough to place in the house of a large doll will cost $1.25. It includes an afternoon tea set of metal cups and saucers, plates, spoons, sugar tongs, teapot, sugar bowl, and creamer, with a small chafing dish.

***

Automobile hats may be useful, but they are not beautiful. Made in straw, the hat part is in a simple design, and it has at the back a hood of dark blue or brown to match the colors used in the hat, and it is fastened under the chin.

***

Pipings are being used in coats and gowns. A long pongee coat has the collar, cape, and belt finished around the edges with pipings of pale blue, and the buttons which match are of pale blue, with rims of gold.

***

BAVARIAN ROYALTIES COMING TO AMERICA.

Special Correspondence NEW YORK TIMES.

BERLIN, April 27.—On board a vessel from Japan there will soon arrive in the United States an interesting royal couple, who are destined at some future time to sit on the throne of the Kingdom of Bavaria. They are Prince Ruprecht and his wife, the one the grandson of the Prince Regent, while the other is the daughter of the noted oculist Prince Dr. Carl Theodor, and the sister of the possible future Queen of Belgium, now the Princess Elizabeth of Flanders.

The Prince and Princess have been on a scientific tour to the Orient, which they have made in company with the well-known Prof. Heinrich Mayr of Munich, who has published many valuable works on India and Japan. With Prince and Princess Ruprecht are also Count von Pappenheim, the Prince's Adjutant.

The royal travelers have had an extended tour. They sailed last December from Genoa for India. There they were royally entertained by Lord Curzon and by a number of Indian Princes. In Java they explored three volcanoes. From there they sailed to Taku, and then they went to Peking. At Pao-ting-Fue they were received by the Empress Dowager of China. Afterward Japan was visited.

Princess Maria Gabriele has written home most enthusiastically about her Eastern trip. Like her parents, Prince and Princess Carl Theodor, she is a great lover of nature, and also of music and art. She is a great favorite of the Bavarian people. The news of her engagement to Prince Ruprecht was received with the greatest enthusiasm, and public joy was also manifested when the couple were married in July, 1900.

Prince Ruprecht is also most popular. After their marriage Prince and Princess Ruprecht settled in Bamberg, where the Prince was at the head of an army corps. There their two children were born. A boy was named after his grandfather, Luitpold. Prince Ruprecht is a great favorite of the Kaiser. Besides holding a commandership in the Bavarian Army, the Prince is a member in suite of the Prussian Hussar Regiment Grosser Kurfuest. He is also the Grand Prior of the Noble Order of St. George. E. VISITORS TO BRONX GARDENS.

In 1902 Those Who Saw the Zoological Exhibition Numbered 731,515.

The annual report of the New York Zoological Society shows an increase in the attendance at the Bronx Park Gardens. The number of visitors who passed through the turnstiles in 1902 was 731,515, the largest number, 126,604, being in August, and the smallest, 9,431, in December. This was an increase of 204,370, or 38¾ per cent. over the total for 1901. The daily average in 1902 was 2,004, which includes Mondays and Thursdays, when an admission fee of 25 cents is charged.

The returns for 1903 indicate a record-breaking year, the attendance to April 23 numbering 228,031, which exceeds the same period of last year by 100,016.

The Aquarium, in Battery Park, which also is under the management of the society, proves a strong attraction. There were 47,340 visitors on Aug. 23, 1902, which was the day of the great naval parade, being the greatest day in the history of the Aquarium. Dewey Day, in 1899, brought 37,246 callers.

The largest attendance is naturally on Sundays, there being 12,703 visitors on April 19 of this year. Rainy days keep the number down somewhat, but it is surprisingly large regardless of the weather. The Zoological Society undertook the management of the Aquarium last November. Since then 1,700,453 visitors have passed through the doors, a daily average of 3,108.

CYRUS E. STAPLES DEAD.

Brooklyn Banker Who Figured in Water Supply Company's Controversy with the City.

Cyrus E. Staples, who was a prominent figure in the financial world of Brooklyn, died of Bright's disease on Thursday in Dr. Gorton's sanitarium in Summit, N. J., where he had been a patient for two weeks. He was born sixty-one years ago in Bangor, Me., and in early life he followed the sea. In the seventies he embarked in the banking and brokerage business in Brooklyn.

He made a specialty of handling Brooklyn securities and carried through the deal by which a syndicate bought large blocks of the stock of the Brooklyn City Railroad Company prior to the organization of the old Long Island Traction Company. His name figured in the Long Island Water Supply Company controversy and it was said that he acted as promoting agent in the matter. The company sought to sell out to the city, but the city refused to pay the price asked. Later the city secured the plant at a much lower figure.

He had apartments in the Hotel Margaret, Brooklyn, and a Summer place at Bayside, L. I., and he was a member of the Brooklyn and Hamilton Clubs of Brooklyn, the Reform Club of Manhattan, and the Great South Bay Yacht Club. He left a widow.

Store Cattle in England.

So many misleading statements as to the exclusion of store cattle from Canada have been published in this country that it is not surprising to see them accepted and repeated elsewhere. It seems impossible to get rid of the impression that we maintain a distinguishing prohibition against Canadian store cattle, whereas we do nothing of the kind. In 1896 Parliament deliberately adopted the policy of ordering the port slaughter of all cattle, sheep, or pigs allowed to be landed in this country, except under special circumstances, with a period of quarantine, for the security of our herds and flocks against disease. The act then passed practically, though not specifically, excludes store cattle from all countries. But for that act the interior parts of the United Kingdom would almost certainly have been open to store cattle from Argentina and the United States before the comparatively recent outbreaks of foot-and-mouth disease in those two countries, and the results in the United Kingdom would probably have been disastrous. If admitted Canadian store cattle, we should be constrained to admit also store animals from every other country believed by our Board of Agriculture to be, for the time being, equally free from contagious or infectious disease.—The Toronto Mail and Empire appears to suppose that Mr. Hanbury excludes Canadian stores, whereas all stores were practically excluded long before he came into office, and he has no power to admit them from any country. The journal named makes the unwarrantable assertion that "it has been all but admitted by the President of the Board of Agriculture" that the exclusion of Canadian stores "is for the protection of the British cattle raised from competition, and not for the protection of British cattle from disease." No justification for this assertion is to be found in any public speech delivered by Mr. Hanbury. It is equally incorrect to say that he has been guilty of "libeling" Canadian animals. On the contrary, he has declared his belief in the healthiness of those animals in several occasions, while declining to ask Parliament to upset for their protection the wise sanitary policy of the act of 1896.—London Standard.

Drumming Up Trade.

"Sir," began the caller, "I would like to marry your daughter."

"Sir, I did not say I wished to be married to your daughter, but to marry her. I'm a clergyman, sir, and I need the fee."—Philadelphia Public Ledger.

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON.

Copyright, 1903, by John H. Whitney.

SUBJECT—Paul Before Felix. Acts, xxiv., 10-16; 25, 26.

GOLDEN TEXT—I will fear no evil: for Thou art with me. Psalms, xxiii., 4.

Two men, two scenes, two results, are now brought before us. The two men are Felix and Paul. The one is the Roman Governor of Judea. The other is a missionary of the cross. Both are representative men. The two scenes are two judicial trials. In the first Paul the missionary stands before Felix the Governor. In the other Felix the Governor stands before Paul the missionary. The two results are the issues of these two trials. When Paul was judged he had "a conscience void of offense toward God and toward men," (v. 16.) When Felix was judged he "trembled." (v. 25.)

One of these men was noted for his evil deeds and impure life. The other was noted for his good deeds and holy life. The one lived for himself, the other lived for Jesus Christ. The essential difference between them, however, did not rest in their positions, or in their characters, or in their lives, as they appeared in the sight of men; but in their relationships to God. "Felix trembled" when he saw how he stood before Him and His law, because of "the judgment to come." (v. 25.) Paul not only did not fear, but he rejoiced in the "hope that there shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and unjust." (v. 15.) It is this which makes the essential difference between men everywhere to-day.

In "five days," (v. 1,) after Paul and his escort arrived in Cæsarea—or, perhaps, in "five days" after they left Jerusalem—Paul's accusers appeared in Cæsarea as they had been commanded to do by Claudius Lysias, (xxiii., 30.) They consisted of "Ananias, the High Priest,—some of "the elders," a representing probably the Sanhedrin—and a certain orator named Tertullus," (v. 1,) who had been engaged to present their case to Felix. At once, apparently on their arrival, Felix gave them audience, and Paul was brought before him. Now Paul was to undergo a regular legal trial before the highest civil court in the land, the Governor himself being the Judge. When he appeared before the Sanhedrin it was simply for the purpose of making an informal examination for the benefit of the Chief Captain. Now, however, he was to be formally accused and judged. The issue might be life, or death, and Paul must make his defense as best he could.

CAREER OF FELIX.

Felix was originally a Roman slave, and was made a freedman by—or through the influence of—the Emperor Claudius, and out of gratitude at once lent himself as a willing tool to aid in carrying out any wicked plot the Emperor might devise. So he rose rapidly in his estimation, and was at last appointed Procurator of Judea. Although a villain of the deepest dye, he still was still an abject slave—a slave to the vilest and basest passions. In his administration of the Government, however, he had done many things of great benefit to the nation, especially in the vigor with which he had suppressed the bands of robbers which infested the country. To this Tertullus alluded in his flattering address. He had now been Governor for about six or seven years, and in that time had become well acquainted with the character of the Jewish people, and must also have heard much of the new doctrines proclaimed by the apostles and their disciples. As a matter of course, however, he naturally looked upon everything from a Roman standpoint.

When the court was opened the case of Ananias and his associates was presented by their lawyer, Tertullus, and when they assented to it as embodying all their charges against Paul, Felix "beckoned unto him to speak." (v. 10.) Acknowledging his satisfaction in being thus permitted to plead his case before one who was well able to understand it, Paul first called attention to the fact that it was only "twelve days" since he had reached Jerusalem. The last five of these days he performs duties—had been spent on the journey from Jerusalem, and in Cæsarea. Two had probably been spent in the Castle of Antonia. Thus he must have wrought all the mischief that was charged against him in the brief period of "not more than" twelve days. Having thus established his position, he proceeded to answer specifically the complaints of Tertullus. There were three separate counts in his indictment.

The first was: "We have found this man a pestilent fellow, and a mover of sedition amongst all the Jews throughout the world." (v. 5.) If this was true, Paul was guilty of treason against the Roman Government. He answered it by a flat denial of its truth, and he boldly challenged them to produce the proof. Without any parade of words, he asserted: "They neither found me in the Temple disputing with any man, neither in the synagogues nor in the city; neither can they prove the things whereof they now accuse me." (vv. 12 and 13.)

The second charge was that he was "a ringleader of the sect of the Nazarenes." (v. 5.) This referred to Paul's connection with the Nazarites in completing their vow, but simply to the fact that he was a Christian. For the disciples of Christ were sometimes called "Nazarenes," as in this case, sometimes "Galileans," as on the day of Pentecost, (ii., 7,) and sometimes simply men of this "way," (ix. 2) or "That Way," (xix., 9,) or "The Way," (v. 14.) As the Roman law, however, tolerated every "sect" (or "heresy") in the land, and to a certain extent protected them, to be prominent among the Nazarenes," was to be a "sect." Paul therefore, openly and frankly admitted that the charge was true. If it was an offense to belong to a "sect," then every Jew in the land—Ananias, the Elders, and Tertullus—were as guilty as he. So without hesitation he pleaded this point, confronting unto thee, that after the way which they call a sect, so serve I the God of our fathers, believing all things which are according to the law, and which are written in the prophets; having hope toward God, which these also themselves look for, that there shall be a resurrection both of the just and the unjust. Herein do I also exercise myself to have a conscience void of offense toward God and toward men." (xv., 14-16, R. V.)

PAUL'S ANSWERS.

The third charge was, "Who also hath gone about to profane the Temple." (v. 6.) This was equivalent to charging Paul with sacrilege, an offense punishable under both the Jewish and Roman laws. In answer to it he told the simple story of his bringing alms to his people, and of his uniting with the Nazarites in the completion of their vows. All this, he showed, was done with due observance of the law, and without any tumult. (vv. 17, 18.)

Having thus answered each specific count in the indictment, Paul then called the attention of the court to the fact that those who had first laid hold of him—"certain Jews from Asia," (v. 19,) were not present to make accusation," (v. 19, R. V.) against him. And of those who were present, there was not one who could bear witness to anything which even they would consider "evil doing," unless—as in the case of Daniel—they found it against him concerning the law of his God." (Dan. vi., 5.) As regards the question which had excited so much tumult in the Sanhedrin—"touching the resurrection of the dead," (v. 21,) there were such great differences of opinion that no one could justly charge this "hope" (that he had) (xxiii., 6,) as an offence against either the law or the people.

To this defense of Paul it appears that no rejoinder whatever was made by his accusers. As Dr. Arnold truly says, "Those things in the accusation that were criminal were not true, and those things that were true were not criminal. The crimes falsely charged he denied, and challenged his accusers to the proof—the portions of the indictment that were true, he confessed and contended that they violated no law." ("The Church in the House.")

Felix, however, unwilling, probably, to displease the influential Jews who were present, reserved his decision of the case until he could confer with Claudius Lysias. (Verse 22.) but he did not keep Paul in close confinement. He committed him to the care of a "centurion," with instructions "to let him have liberty, and that he should forbid none of his acquaintance to minister or come unto him." (Verse 23.) This liberty must have been highly appreciated, for Paul had many friends in Cæsarea, and it gave him many opportunities to proclaim the Gospel to others. During this time, when he was perfectly safe from all of his enemies, he also had a season of greatly needed personal rest and refreshment, for it lasted fully "two years." (Verse 27.) For the greater part of this time Luke is supposed to have been with him, and probably at his dictation then wrote the Gospel bearing his name.

FELIX AND DRUSILLA.

After the trial which we have just considered Felix apparently left Cæsarea for a time, probably to attend to official duties elsewhere—at least he does not appear to have had anything to do with Paul for some time. "After certain days," however, he "came with his wife, Drusilla, which was a Jewess," and "sent for" him. (Verse 24.) This Drusilla was the third daughter of Herod Agrippa I., who put the Apostle James to death, (xii., 2,) and was the sister of Herod Agrippa II., who soon after was "almost persuaded to be a Christian." (xxvi., 28.) After disappointing her first accepted suitor, she married Azizus, King of Emesa. When Felix saw her, he was greatly enamored by her beauty, and tradition says—according to Josephus—that he employed a magician to entice her away from her husband. The plan was successful, and she was now living in open wickedness with Felix as his wife.

Dr. Arnot says: "To relieve their languor, Felix and Drusilla determined to send for and hear a specimen from the distinguished preacher who happened to be their prisoner." Conybeare and Howson say: "Drusilla, being a Jewess, took a lively interest in what Felix told her of Paul, and was curious to hear something of this faith which had Christ for its object." Whether it was to while away an idle hour, or a mere curiosity concerning a matter which was everywhere turning "the world upside down," we may be sure that the motive of Felix in sending for Paul was neither holy nor altogether good. However, he sent to the prison for Paul that he and Drusilla might hear what he had to say "concerning the faith in Christ," (v. 24,) and Paul gladly obeyed the summons. He probably knew that it would not in any way affect his personal liberty, but it would give him an opportunity to proclaim the Gospel and might be the means of setting another at liberty from a worse bondage than of a Roman prison.

Undoubtedly he knew the character of his hearers, and—looking at the occasion from a merely human standpoint—it appears on the surface as if he had designedly chosen for the theme of his discourse just those subjects which were the most pertinent to such characters—"righteousness," "temperance," and "judgment to come." But if we look a little deeper, it is not likely that he did anything of the kind. The Holy Ghost had put such a powerful and pertinent application, to whomsoever it is addressed. Paul was there to tell his hearers "concerning the faith in Christ," and it would not have been either like him or like the Gospel he preached to have used the occasion as an opportunity to administer to them a public and personal reproof, however well they deserved it.

To tell them of "faith in Christ" he must necessarily first tell them why they and all others needed that faith. When he spoke to them, therefore, of "righteousness," and "temperance," and made them look at themselves in the light of the "judgment to come," it was not because they were notoriously unjust and impure. He would have addressed them in the same way if their characters had been above reproach and reputation. In fact, he did speak in just the same way to the polished and scholarly Athenians, and bade them to remember that God had appointed a "day in which He would judge the world in righteousness," and therefore He "commanded all men everywhere to repent." (xvii., 30-31.)

PAUL'S ADDRESS.

Paul's address therefore is just as appropriate for all men in our midst to-day as it was to Felix and Drusilla. He looked at his hearers as they stood before God rather than as they stood before men, and that is the way in which exponents of "faith in Christ" must always look at their hearers, for before Him "there is no difference" between men, (Rom., iii., 22.)

When Paul spoke to his hearers of "righteousness" he measured their outward life by the standard of God's law, and showed them that they had never learned to obey the prophet's command—"to do justly and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with God." (Micah, vi., 8.) They had "come short" far short in all of these respects and they knew it. When he spoke of "temperance" he measured their inward spirit by the same law. For this word "temperance" is not employed here in the modern and narrower sense of freedom from all excess in the use of intoxicants, it means that and a great deal more. Its classical and New Testament signification is much wider than that which it ordinarily bears now in our own language. It means freedom from all that degrades. It demands personal purity on all sides." (Dr. Arnot.) It requires a clean heart as well as a clean life, "for out of the heart proceed evil thoughts, murders, adulteries, fornications, thefts, false witness, blasphemies." (Matt. xv., 19.)

Thus Paul brought his hearers—in their outward conduct and in their inward spirit—before God's bar, Paul spoke to them of "the judgment to come"—when "every one shall give account of himself to God." (Rom. xiv., 12.) Knowing, therefore, the "terror of the Lord," (II. Cor., v. 11,) he evidently endeavored to "persuade" them "to be reconciled to God" through faith in Christ Jesus. For his address would have been incomplete if he had not held Him up before them as the Saviour of even the chief of sinners, and it was in fact to speak "concerning faith" in Him that he had been summoned from his prison.

But neither the terrors of the law nor the love of Christ brought either of Paul's hearers to repentance. Drusilla, the Jewess, was unmoved, and Felix, the Roman, "trembled" only for the moment. As he had put off the decision of Paul's case when Paul stood before him, so now he put off the decision of his own case when he stood before Paul. "When I have a convenient season," he said, "I will call for thee." (v. 25.) But we do not read that he ever had a more "convenient season." He had many opportunities, for he often sent for Paul "and communed with him," (v. 26,) but it was never "convenient" for him to give up his sins and turn to God. Worldly companionship—love of pleasure—and thirst for money, so filled his soul that there was no room in mind or heart for anything else.

There are many like him even in our own day. They are waiting for "a convenient season." But the Gospel says, "Behold, now is the accepted time; behold, now is the day of salvation." (II. Cor., vi., 2.)

QUESTIONS ON THE LESSON.

What are the important facts now brought before us, and what is said of the two men?

When and how was this court organized before which Paul was now tried, and who was Felix?

To what did Paul call attention, and how did he answer the charges made against him?

How were his answers met—what did Felix decide—and what was the result to Paul?

What led to Paul's appearance again before Felix?

On what subjects did Paul address Felix, and what is said of his address?

How did Paul measure the outward life and the inward spirit of his hearers, and what must he have said "concerning the faith in Christ"?

What was the effect upon his hearers, and what is God's "accepted time"?

Sergt. McGloin of the West One Hundredth Street Station received a letter yesterday which contained instructions for two detectives of the precinct. The Sergeant read the letter carefully and then called out Detectives McLaughlin and McManus.

"Go to Ninety-sixth Street," he told them, "and see what's the matter with that pagoda."

"Who is Pagoda?" asked McLaughlin of McManus.

The detectives then went to Ninety-sixth Street and searched from one end to the other for an Italian named Pagoda. They couldn't find any person by that name, and they returned to the station house.

"Would you please read that order again?" asked McLaughlin of Sergt. McGloin.

Sergt. McGloin picked up the piece of paper on which the order had been written by Capt. Gallagher, and read:

"'Tenement-house children have been jumping on the Pagoda at Eighty-sixth Street. Send men to chase them away.' That's all I know about it."

This time the detectives went to the subway and questioned all the strikers that were hanging around there as to whether any of them were named Pagoda. Several of the men became frightened and ran away, and once again the detectives went back to the station house.

"Well, you had better make another search. It's the Captain's orders," said Sergt. McGloin.

Wearied and disheartened, McLaughlin and McManus retraced their footsteps to Ninety-sixth Street. There they met a brother detective named Seaman.

"Do you know a man named Pagoda?" asked McLaughlin.

"Yes. Who is Pagoda?" echoed McManus.

Then they told Seaman of their futile search for the Italian and the detective got red in the face from laughing.

"Why, a pagoda is one of those lookout towers on the viaduct on Riverside Drive," he explained. "Some woman has been complaining about the street children playing in them and soiling them."

McLaughlin and McManus went to the viaduct, chased away a few children who were playing in the pagoda, and then went to the station house for a rest.

Capt. Gallagher's orders came from a letter sent to Park Commissioner Willcox from a woman who complained of the children playing in the pagodas on the viaduct. The Commissioner sent the letter to Police Headquarters, and Inspector Albertson notified Capt. Gallagher.

THE FINANCIAL MARKETS

Money easy, 2@2½ per cent.

It is useless to discuss yesterday's prices at any length. Of over fifty representative properties only four changed so much as a point. The rest shifted up and down according to the higgling of the market. There were some who thought the coppers were kept strong in order to sell the rest of the market. If so, the latter part of the programme failed, for the business was not done, or capable of being done without rider price changes than were registered. The day's freak sale was a decline of 51, to 10; against the last price of 61 some months ago. This appears to be another "golden bargain," to use unoriginal language not copyrighted and adaptable to all such cases.

There is scarcely warrant for saying that the Russian bear was at work in the market. The reoccupation of Niu-Chwang by Russians was dismissed as unimportant by itself, and only in limited circles were two and two put together. The larger operators—those who initiate movements which others imitate—remarked that the morrow of England's declaration of a British Monroe Doctrine was chosen at Washington for the publication of old correspondence formally and unmistakably committing Russia to a position inconsistent with her present procedure, and antagonistic with the treaty rights of the United States. Such things do not happen accidentally, and it was inferred that the Administration is testing or preparing public opinion regarding more advanced action than any yet taken. The Washington telegrams to this effect were not generally known until after adjournment, and will afford the basis for to-morrow's brief business. The situation is not serious yet, nor is there any certitude that it will become serious. What is certain is that the tangled skein of weltpolitik has a broader and closer significance in Wall Street than ever before, and that topics which have wearied hitherto must be studied in their relations to market movements as never before. There is need of phlegm and philosophy, and there were signs of both in keeping the market inactive until the outlook is clearer.

The domestic news was not bad. Upon the contrary, reports of railway earnings are improving beyond recent expectation. Crop news is good and exports are growing beyond a good previous total. The labor situation leaves much to be desired, but develops nothing seriously disturbing. The allotments of American subscriptions to "vaals"—that's English, you know—were estimated at sums cutting no figure in the sterling exchange situation, and Philadelphia sent word that there would be no gold exports this week, which settled it. Philadelphia, which is rising in the world, also sent information that a poor New York bank statement would not be surprising. That will not be settled until after the bank statement appears. The banks appear to have gained three millions of cash over the exports of gold, and the marked ease in the money market reflects no local anticipations of anything very bad.

FEATURES OF THE MARKET.

It is a difficult matter to determine which was the "feature" of yesterday's market—the manipulated advance in Amalgamated Copper on the fantastic tale that the trust intends to return to the policy of "holding the umbrella" by advancing the price of copper to 16 cents a pound and maintaining it there, or the sharp declines in a number of inactive shares, notably Denver and Southwestern, which dropped 51 points from the last recorded transaction for a full lot of the stock on the Exchange. Undoubtedly, whichever was the "feature," stockmarketwise, the development that was regarded as of most significance was the sharp declines referred to, because believed to indicate a none too stable condition of affairs in certain parts of the list, with a bare possibility that other parts might sooner or later be affected thereby. So far as the copper movement was concerned, its real purpose, it is declared, was to hold the market steady while selling was in progress in other parts of the list.

As for the stocks whose declines created some comment and more uneasiness, they were Denver and Southwestern, preferred, American Grass Twine, and United States Shipbuilding. In each case the transactions were very limited—100 shares in Denver, 200 in Grass Twine, and 300 in Shipbuilding—but it was this very development that was least to the liking of conservative interests in the Street, because showing in each instance practically no market for the stocks. The last transaction in a full lot of Denver and Southwestern preferred was in August, 1902, when it sold at 61, while in July, 1901, shortly after its listing, it sold at 69¾. Yesterday's sale at 10, therefore, represents a net decline of 51 and a decline from the high of 69¾. Odd lots, however, have latterly held above 50. Poor earnings, due to the competition that the road is meeting in the Colorado Springs territory, are offered to explain the decline. The sale of the Shipbuilding stock at 23 a share was the first made on the Exchange, but the stock has sold as low as 21 at auction. In the books of the company $95,000 changed hands between 40 and 90, with the close at the low figure. The three-point decline in Grass Twine was, of course, naturally referable to the unsatisfactory condition and earnings of the company.

Pennsylvania sold ex-rights at the opening of business, the rights being quoted between 3⅛ and 3⅛, and it was thought that the stock would, in the vernacular, "look cheap." Despite this, after opening at 131½, it sold down to 130¾ and closed at 131. In the Street it was said that it did not act well—by this being meant that it seemed always to be for sale at every appearance of strength. The same, indeed, was declared to be true of all the other standard stocks, the entire railway list being conspicuously heavy. The selling throughout was characterized as better than the buying, this being a modification of the earlier reports that the selling was not important and was merely for the account of room traders.

One of the interesting developments of recent days has been the appearance in the Street of New York Central stock, standing in the name of interests close to the Vanderbilts, the stock having been disposed of by the owners. Inasmuch as this is said to be the first of such stock coming from this source since the heavy selling movement in the security some months ago, the Street is curious to know what this may foreshadow. The talk yesterday was that the new stock issue of the company will soon be authorized. There was little activity in the issue yesterday, but traders were inclined to be bearish on it in view of the Supreme Court decision in the tunnel case against the company.

Apropos of the pool manipulation in Copper Trust stock—clearly designed to permit selling of stock elsewhere—one of the stories heard in the Street, in explanation of it, was that a trade agreement had been reached by the Amalgamated and Calumet and Hecla people to advance and hold the price of the metal at 16 cents a pound. The report was not given serious consideration in well-informed quarters where the rather bitter experience of the Amalgamated people some time ago to hold the price artificially to 17 cents is recalled. In addition, the active and controlling force in Amalgamated affairs—Mr. H. H. Rogers—has been for some weeks and still is unable to transact any business. And, say copper trade authorities, without Mr. Rogers's approval and co-operation no Amalgamated deals will be carried through, so long as he remains at the head of the company.

Many would-be bulls on the market declare that they are waiting for the labor situation to clarify before they will buy, or advise the purchase of stocks. These interests believe that it is this labor uncertainty more than anything else that is keeping the public out of the market, for strike round and about are things of which all men are cognizant and which oftimes make greater impression and cause more alarm than the facts actually justify.

Profit-taking was in evidence all day in the Rock Island and 'Frisco shares. The average speculator is not inclined to trade in the stocks pending the publication of the fuller official announcement of the deal and its terms, which is now scheduled for to-day.

A few pessimists in the Street were pointing to the heaviness in the pig iron market as perhaps the first indication of the "turn" in the iron trade. Trade experts, however, declare that the present is merely a "waiting movement," and that the sagging tendency noted has therefore no real significance.

Some selling of the Grangers was credited to reports of crop damage in Illinois and Missouri, where, according to some dispatches, Winter wheat was reported to be damaged from 5 to 35 per cent. The Street took these reports with several grains of salt, as it did also reports of damage elsewhere by insects.

The selling of Southern Pacific was on the unfavorable March report, showing a net decrease of $132,560.

LOW WHEAT SUPPLIES.

According to Bradstreet's, manipulation at Chicago is not the sole inspiration of the present strength of wheat. Statistically the position at home and abroad is and has been a very strong one, and when the numerous reports of damage to European crops are added a trio of bullish features of no mean order is furnished. Says Bradstreet's:

As regards the statistical position alone, it might be observed that the showing is one which might well give thought to those who, in view of the probable very large yield of Winter wheat in this country, are inclined to look for much lower prices soon for this great staple. Briefly stated, it might be said that American (United States and Canadian) supplies of wheat are the smallest held for four years past, while European supplies on May 1 are the smallest there is any record of on that date for fully a decade past. The aggregate American and European supply is much smaller than in any of the past four years at this date, and is only slightly larger than in the memorable year 1898, when prices went to very high figures. All in all, the situation is one which contains much that is promising to American wheat producers and dealers, and favorable to this branch of the country's export trade.

The total American supply on May 1 was 56,208,000 bushels, a decrease of 18,498,000 bushels from April 1 this year, or 9,027,000 bushels from May 1 a year ago, or 9,414,000 bushels from May 1, 1901, and of 28,546,000 bushels from May 1, 1900. Compared with May 1, 1899, present supplies are 5,000,000 bushels larger, and are 22,000,000 larger than on May 1, 1898. European supplies are even more closely straitened than is the case with American stocks. On May 1 the former supply aggregated only 52,200,000 bushels, a decrease of 4,000,000 bushels for the month of April, due, according to cables to Bradstreet's, to Russian stocks on May 1, revised, proving much smaller than expected. The present European stock is shown to be 16,000,000 bushels smaller than a year ago at this time, 26,000,000 bushels smaller than on May 1, 1901, and the smallest, in fact, held on May 1 that there is record of in recent years. Compared with May 1, 1897, present European supplies are 4,000,000 bushels smaller. The aggregated American and European supply is shown to have been only 106,468,000 bushels on May 1 this year, a decrease of 18,000,000 bushels from a year ago, of 35,000,000 bushels from 1901, and of 40,000,000 bushels from 1900. Compared with the low-water mark year, 1898, present world's stocks are only 13,000,000 bushels larger.

MOVEMENT OF CURRENCY.

The principal movements of currency this week indicate that the banks gained thereby $3,081,200. They received from the interior $5,540,200 and sent to the interior $2,114,000, of which $50,000 was transferred through the Sub-Treasury to New Orleans. The gain from the interior was $3,426,200.

Receipts of new gold were $1,022,600, of which $762,100 was on New York Assay Office checks, $255,800 on San Francisco Mint checks and telegraphic transfers, and $4,700 on Seattle Assay Office checks.

Exports of gold were $200,000—$300,000 to Argentina and $400,000 to Canada.

The ordinary Sub-Treasury disbursements were $19,446,600. Payments to the Sub-Treasury for customs, internal revenue, 5 per cent. redemption fund, &c., were $19,720,000. The loss on Sub-Treasury operations proper was $273,000.

The total gain from the interior and new gold was $4,254,800, deducting the loss of $1,175,000 by gold exports and Sub-Treasury operations, the net gain was $3,081,200.

Currency was received from all parts of the country, but chiefly from the West and South. Shipments were mainly to Boston and Philadelphia.

TRADE DEVELOPMENTS.

Trade reports to the several commercial agencies continue favorable, though the threatening labor situation is said not to be encouraging. Bradstreet's sums the situation up in this manner:

Business continues large and industry active, in most cases surpassing previous years at this date, despite unseasonable cool weather in some sections and a swarm of vexatious and, in many cases, palpably unreasonable labor troubles. Results of the late cold wave now coming to hand are seen in arrested vegetable growth in nearly all sections, with damage to Spring-planted crops, notably corn, cotton, oats, vegetables, and fruits, which necessitates much replanting. It is notable, however, that Winter wheat has gone through and emerged from the late freeze with strikingly little deterioration from early favorable conditions in large measure. Spring interests seem to have eliminated the strikes or lockouts of fully 160,000 men in the first week of May, a number double that becoming idle in the last week of April and fully 40 per cent. of the entire number striking since Jan. 1. A general lockout of building hands at New York has begun which may swell the figures largely. This would be in many respects a rather depressing showing were it not for the fact that except in the building trades, no single or allied great industries are threatened, as, for instance, was the case a year ago, when the great anthracite coal strike was impending.

Dun's along the same lines has this to say:

Unrest in the ranks of labor has increased rather than abated since May 1, when difficulties of this sort usually culminate. No single struggle of great magnitude is in progress, but the frequency of small strikes is disturbing, and in the aggregate a large force is idle, while important industrial undertakings are checked. This is notably the case as to structural work, of which a large amount has been contemplated. Good reports are received from footwear factories, shipments from Boston for the year thus far surpassing all records, and clothing makers receive duplications of Spring orders in addition to getting out Fall samples. At Baltimore there is great activity in the manufacture of straw hats and negligee shirts, while paper mills at Philadelphia find conditions satisfactory. Weather reports are irregular, stimulating retail trade at some points, but more often retarding the distribution of merchandise. Prices of commodities declined slightly during April, Dun's Index Number falling from $90.367 to $88.561. A year ago the highest point of recent years was touched at $102.289. Railway earnings in April were 15.4 per cent. larger than in last year and 28.7 per cent. above 1901. Sales of stocks were again small compared with the corresponding week in the two preceding years, particularly as to 1901, when the Northern Pacific corner occurred. This accounts for the decline of 31.2 per cent. in bank exchanges at New York from last year's figures and 45.2 per cent. compared with two years ago. At other leading cities the loss from 1902 was only 4 per cent., and there was a gain of 6.0 over 1901.

MAY COTTON'S HIGH RECORD.

Quoted at 11.01—Still Higher Prices Looked For.

Cotton for delivery in May reached another high-record mark yesterday. Early in the morning it was quoted at 11.01. Spot cotton sold on the basis of 11.15 cents a pound for middling. The market closed steady at 10.93 for the May option.

Still higher prices are looked for, especially as there is a squeeze of shorts in the New Orleans market as well as in this city. Options for delivery in the new crop months were less active and showed few changes in price.

JERSEY CITY BONDS SOLD.

The Jersey City Board of Finance has finally succeeded in disposing of $900,000 worth of 4 per cent. water bonds by private sale at 100.80. These bonds had been advertised three times. The best offer made was 100.70.

Samuel B. Howard of Manhattan took $500,000 worth of the bonds, which are to pay off bonds that matured Sept. 1, 1902. The other $400,000, the proceeds of which will be used to pay off the floating debt of the Water Department, were sold to the First National Bank of New York.

CANADIAN TRADE.

Canadian trade advices to Dun's Review are to the effect that wholesale trade is generally good at Toronto, and remittances are satisfactory. Trade at Montreal is badly interrupted by the longshoremen's strike, a sympathetic strike of teamsters, and freight handlers threaten to quit. Wharves and railroad yards are congested, and there is danger of serious loss in perishable freight. Otherwise trade is healthy and country collections prompt. Business and collections are well maintained at Quebec, but rain is needed in agricultural districts. Present conditions and future prospects are satisfactory at Winnepeg, with labor well employed. Although on the whole business conditions at Vancouver are only fairly satisfactory, improvement is indicated in some lines, and collections are fairly prompt.

THE LONDON MARKET.

LONDON TIMES—NEW YORK TIMES Special Cablegram.

LONDON, May 9.—The Times, in its City article to-day, says another enormous sum, larger than on Thursday, was lent by the Bank of England yesterday. Business in the loan and discount markets was practically at a standstill.

The Stock Exchange was again chiefly occupied with the Transvaal loan. Dealings in it were very large, and it closed at 1 1-16 to 1 3-16 premium, after falling to 1 premium in the morning.

Consols were flat on the Manchurian news, but recovered to some extent before the close. Home rails were flat in sympathy with consols.

American rails opened with a short-lived show of strength, a rapid relapse following the reports in regard to Manchuria. Prices were then dull till the afternoon, when Wall Street reports indicated similar weakness there, accentuated by the hardening of sterling exchange, which increased the fears that gold shipments were almost imminent.

Foreigns were flat, Paris selling heavily. The general mining market was quiet, but prices were very firm. Kafirs were again depressed.

Silver bars rose 1-16d. per ounce, to 24 15-16d. spot, and the forward price also rose. The movement was caused by news of a French tender to be filed two months hence.

By The Associated Press.

LONDON, May 8.—Money was in strong demand in the market to-day. Discounts were harder.

Business on the Stock Exchange was inactive, but operators were cheerful. The Transvaal loan was the sole feature of interest. Consols were easier on sales in connection with the Transvaal loan. Americans opened dull, owing to over-night New York advices; improved, rose mostly to above parity, and closed quiet. Argentines were weak. Closing prices:

Consols for money, 92 1-16; consols for account, 92⅛; Anaconda, 6⅝; Atchison, 82; Atchison preferred, 100; Baltimore and Ohio, 94⅝; Canadian Pacific, 130¾; Chesapeake and Ohio, 45⅝; Chicago Great Western, 23¾; Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul, 166; De Beers, 22; Denver and Rio Grande, 30⅝; Denver and Rio Grande preferred, 87¾; Erie, 36; Erie first preferred, 70⅝; Erie second preferred, 53; Illinois Central, 141½; Louisville and Nashville, 121¼; Missouri, Kansas and Texas, 26⅝; New York Central, 134½; Norfolk and Western, 73⅝; Norfolk and Western preferred, 91; Ontario and Western, 30⅝; Pennsylvania, 10½; Rand Mines, 10⅝; Reading, 28½; Reading first preferred, 85; Reading second preferred, 36; Southern Railway, 31¼; Southern Railway preferred, 95; Southern Pacific, 56⅞; Union Pacific, 92⅞; Union Pacific preferred, 93¼; United Steel, 36¼; United States Steel preferred, 87; Wabash, 28⅝; Wabash preferred, 49.

Money, 3½@4 per cent.

The rate of discount in the open market for short bills is 3½@3⅝ per cent.

The rate of discount in the open market for three months' bills is 3½@3⅝ per cent.

In Continental Centres.

PARIS, May 8.—Prices were weak at the opening of the Bourse to-day, showed feebleness throughout, and closed with a bad tone. The order for the departure of the French fleet to Salonika was the chief factor in causing the depression, as it is feared it will lead to complications in the Orient. Rentes went off considerably, closing at 97.67, against 98.22 yesterday. Turks and Ottoman Bank shares were also depressed, and other international securities were unsteady, with a downward tendency. Suez Canal lost considerably, and industrials shared in the downward movement. Rio Tintos held up for a while against the fall in prices, but finally yielded to the general decline.

The private rate of discount was 2⅛ per cent.

Three per cent. rentes, 97f 85c for the account. Exchange on London, 25f 19c for checks.

BERLIN, May 8.—On the Boerse to-day call money was one-half per cent. lower, being quoted at 2⅛ per cent. Both domestic and foreign securities were slightly weaker. Canadian Pacific followed the New York quotations.

Exchange on London, 20 marks 49 pfennigs for checks. Discount rates: Short bills, 3½ per cent.; three months' bills, 3 per cent.

BOSTON, May 8.—The money market continues quiet and easy. Call loans, 3@3½ per cent; collateral, 4¼ per cent.; time loans on mercantile paper, 4¼@5 per cent.; Clearing House loans, 3 per cent.; New York funds, par; clearings, $21,898,058; balances, $1,234,122. The foreign exchange market remains firm. Rates remain unchanged.

There was some activity in Amalgamated and Copper Range, but Massachusetts Gas was the feature of the stock market. The action of the Legislative Committee in reporting a bill for the consolidation of the Boston gas companies was taken as a bull factor.

PHILADELPHIA PRICES.

PHILADELPHIA, May 8.—It was one of the dullest days of the year in the local market. The only movements that called for comment were the early rally in the Consolidated Lake Superiors, which was not maintained, and the hardening tendency exhibited by United Gas Improvement, which opened, ex-rights, at 94½, shaded to 94¼, and then rallied to 95⅛. The rights were quoted at 44 to 44¾. Consolidated Traction of New York touched 60 on an odd lot transaction, a gain of over 2 points this week. The formation of the Public Service Company gives it a second guarantee in addition to that of the North Jersey Traction Company. The guarantee is 3 per cent. this year, 4 per cent. in 1904, and 5 per cent. thereafter. There was a marked curtailment in the arbitrage business, Pennsylvania being absolutely neglected. Reading was fairly active at the start, but became dormant with the rest.

To Leave the Clearing House.

The Continental Trust Company yesterday notified the Clearing House Association of its intention to withdraw from its Clearing House connection after the close of business May 16. It was announced some time ago that it would withdraw, but the date was not given.

OUTSIDE SECURITIES.

None of the recent dull days in the outside market presented fewer features of interest than did yesterday's market. Relatively few stocks were dealt in, and nowhere in the list were the transactions even fairly large. While the dullness which the market is showing at present and has shown for some time past is no greater than has often occurred during the past two years, yet the present lack of business seems to be getting considerable concern to at least some of those interested in the outside market. Not only investment stocks, but even those which are frequently manipulated on a large scale are suffering from the prevailing dullness, a fact that increases the feeling of discouragement. In the matter of prices yesterday's market was largely a counterpart of that of the previous day, a few stocks showing gains, but the majority being quoted at prices fractionally below those of Thursday.

NORTHERN SECURITIES sold off sharply during the first hour of trading, declining a full point on relatively few sales. Later, however, there was a recovery from the low price, and the final transaction showed only a fractional net loss.

***

INTERNATIONAL MERCANTILE MARINE gave no indication of the strength which recently prevailed in this stock. The way in which both the common and the preferred have dropped off during the last two days on very light transactions seems to confirm the opinion that the advance at the beginning of the week was indicative of nothing more than an effort on the part of some minor interests in the stock to improve its quotation. Certainly the record of the recent advance and the still more recent reaction in no way points to any activity on the part of the important financial interests which are most closely identified with the company.

UNITED STATES SHIPBUILDING 6s were still dealt in on the curb in spite of the resumption of trading in them on the Stock Exchange. The sales of these bonds in the outside market yesterday amounted to a little over $30,000, at prices ranging from 49¾ down to 48¾.

FUNERAL OF FIRE HERO

Sailors and Department Comrades Honor McNally's Memory.

Father Smith's Eulogy of Man Who Died in Performance of Duty—"Taps" at Fire Headquarters.

Funeral services were held yesterday over the body of William McNally in St. Catherine of Sienna's Church, East Sixty-ninth Street. So many there were who wanted to attend that the police were forced to drive crowds away. Among those in the church were Fire Commissioner Sturgis, Secretary Leary, and Acting Chief Purroy.

Four sailors from the battleship Iowa, his old comrades, carried the casket down the stairs in the home of McNally's parents, at 425 East Sixty-ninth Street. Then they transferred their burden to four firemen of Hook and Ladder Company No. 8, with which he was serving when he met his death. They carried the body into the church through lines of sorrowing neighbors, the men and even the small boys removing their hats.

Father E. V. Flood, rector of St. Catherine's, sang the requiem mass, and the Rev. St. Elmo Smith, Chaplain of the Fire Department, delivered the eulogy. Seated near the casket were the young man's father and mother, his brother, and two sisters. Behind them were the bronzed sailors and the firemen. Father Smith said in part:

"It was in the quiet of the Sabbath when the alarm was sounded. Three and twenty was our hero, full of promise, bright of eye, and lithe of body. William McNally was a remarkable youth, eager for strenuous action. At the outbreak of the Spanish war he enlisted in the navy, and was one of the men behind the guns at the battle of Santiago. Hostilities over, with an honorable discharge, he sought active occupation and became a member of the greatest fire corps in the world—the New York Fire Department.

"There is the call, Station 364. I know he is all eagerness for the work. The cry goes up that there is a human being in danger on the fourth floor. Barely is the ladder resting on the wall when, sailor-like, he reaches the top. He leaps into the flames to save an old man. The flames ignite his clothing, but he still struggles to save. Brave, too, are his companions. McAvoy and Shaughnessy follow him. They know his peril. McAvoy, forgetful of self, for 'one of the boys' is in imminent danger, pitches into the flames. The face of McNally appears at the window. He is burning. McAvoy, with the flames licking his face, aided by Shaughnessy, carries McNally to the street. Such are the firemen of New York.

"I want to thank McAvoy and Shaughnessy in the name of all—in my own name from my heart, in the name of religion and in the name of humanity, which is made better for this heroism. After years of wandering, in action and amid danger, what more beautiful and to be desired than the death of this mere boy, who forfeits his life in the discharge of his duty."

After the services the funeral procession formed and started with the body for the Twenty-third Street ferry of the Pennsylvania Railroad. The interment took place in Philadelphia. Preceding the hearse was a carriage filled with floral pieces sent by McNally's fire-fighting comrades, the sailors who had served with him in the war, and many young men, his friends.

Immediately behind the hearse were the men of Hook and Ladder Company No. 8, a detail of sailors, firemen from other companies, a large delegation of young men, and then the carriages with the relatives.

As the cortège passed Fire Headquarters in Sixty-seventh Street a silent alarm was given. Hook and Ladder Company No. 16 and Engine Company No. 39 stood just outside the doors, the horses nervously anxious for duty. The firemen drawn up along the curb stood at "attention." The bells on the apparatus were rung twice to signify "taps." Above the heads of the crowd was the flag at half mast. The department had paid its last respect to its dead.

Down the street to the ferry marched the young men who had fought with McNally when the Spaniards were defeated at Santiago and those who had battled with him against flames in New York. They remained with the body until the train started away to carry it to its final resting place.

It is with profound regret that I have learned of the death of your son, fireman of the fourth grade, William McNally of Hook and Ladder Company No. 8, who met death as the result of injuries received in a heroic endeavor to save the life of an imperiled human being from the top floor of the burning tenement 257 First Avenue, Sunday, the 3d inst.

Your son had been but three months a fireman, and in that short period he had demonstrated his fitness for the arduous duties of his position, and, had his life been spared, the qualities of which he showed himself the possessor would undoubtedly in the course of time have led to well-earned advancement.

He died the death of a hero and his dauntless courage in facing death in the discharge of duty cannot but serve as an inspiration to higher achievements on the part of his comrades in the uniformed force. I have ordered your son's name to be placed in the highest grade of the roll of merit.

PARK AVENUE BLASTING.

Appellate Division Decides That Work in Subway Should Not Be Stopped.

The Supreme Court order denying an injunction to Charles T. Barney to restrain the Rapid Transit Commission and its contractor, John B. McDonald, from excavating and blasting for the tunnel under Park Avenue, in front of the premises at Thirty-eighth Street, was affirmed yesterday by the Appellate Division.

The contract with Mr. McDonald having been modified, the Appellate Court found that to comply with Mr. Barney's demand would cost the city an additional $500,000, and would delay the work for eighteen months. The court exercised its judicial discretion, and said that the work should not be stopped.

RIP VAN WINKLE IN COURT.

Rip Van Winkle appeared in Judge Cowing's court yesterday. He turned out to be an elderly colored person with an expansive smile and glad raiment. He owned up to being Secretary of the "Onward Club" at 304 West Thirty-eighth Street.

Anderson Riley, another negro, who claimed the honor of being President of the organization, was on trial, charged with running a gambling house.

"Is it not a fact that the game of craps was being played in your rooms every night?" asked Assistant District Attorney Sandford.

"Nevah heerd that name in ma life," replied Riley. "The only game we play am baseball, Suh."

"Who is Secretary of the club, if I may ask?" said Mr. Sandford.

"Mistah Rip Van Winkle," was the reply. "He am heah in court now."

"Mr. Rip Van Winkle, will you be so good as to stand up?" called out Mr. Sandford.

The Secretary stood up, and with his perpetual broad smile assured the court that craps was a game quite unknown to the club members.

Cornell Scholarship Examinations.

The examinations for the free scholarships in Cornell University will take place this year on June 6 at 9 A. M. These scholarships allow the selection of one successful candidate from each Assembly district in the State of New York, and are allowed by the Laws of 1894, under which the charter of Cornell University was granted. Any one is eligible for the examination who has spent six months prior to the examination in any common school or academy of the State of New York. Attendants at Normal and private schools are not entitled to the examination.

Coal Road Appeal Postponed.

Clarence J. Shearn, counsel for the complainant in the proceedings against the coal carrying roads, having been unable to get ready the papers in the appeal he is making to the United States Circuit Court to compel the railroad men to submit copies of their books and of their contracts with the coal dealers and miners, the case, which was to have come before Judge Lacombe yesterday, was adjourned until next Friday.

MAYOR LOW FIGHTS THE RAILWAY "GRAB."

Mayor Low yesterday sent a communication to Gov. Odell saying: "I hope you will not sign L'Hommedieu bill. I am convinced that it affects New York importantly, in virtual violation of our charter, and it seems to me legislation of a very vicious type."

The bill would amend the railroad law so as to extend consents for the construction of street railways to 1906. This would revive a lot of old franchises for which consents had been secured. It would permit the construction of lines in Westchester County, and perhaps in New York City.

James S. Lehmaier, in behalf of the West Side Transit Reform Committee of One Hundred, has sent a brief to the Governor approving the L'Hommedieu bill.

Mr. Lehmaier declares that the provision in the bill making it apply to "any city, town, or village wholly or partly contained in any county adjacent to any city of the first class" makes it special city law, and therefore subject to approval of the Mayors of cities to which it applies.

He quotes the decision of the Court of Appeals in McGrath vs. Grout, (171, N. Y., 7,) to show that "the bill is a special city law, and must be approved by the Mayor and legislative bodies of every city in the Counties of Westchester, Niagara, Cattaraugus, and Chautauqua, which are the only counties in the State adjacent to any city of the first class, containing cities."

"It is also submitted that the bill under consideration is unconstitutional," he says, "for the reason that it operates to extend the time within which consents from local authorities may be available. The consent of the local authorities is not a mere statutory requirement; it is provided for in the Constitution, and no condition of the consent whether expressed or implied can be dispensed with by any railroad corporation or by legislative enactment."

"It is further submitted that executive approval should be withheld from the bill under consideration for the reason that it does not specifically exempt the City of New York from the operation of its provisions."

He thus sums up the objections to the bill:

It is unconstitutional.

It places the rights of the City of New York in jeopardy, and may have the effect of preserving franchises which have been given away by old towns and villages, and which should not be permitted to exist without proper limitations and compensations.

The enormous value of street franchises in the City of New York should cause every means to be taken to preserve in full effect the charter provision that they should be limited to twenty-five years. This is one of the most important issues of the present day, and one upon which the public mind is determined.

As the objection has been made by the authorities of the City of New York, by the press, upon the committee hearing, and upon the floor of the Assembly, no sympathy should be wasted upon the railroad promoters who failed to secure a proper amendment to their bill, exempting the City of New York from the operation of its provisions. Their silence in this respect precludes them from sympathy.

No bills intended merely to validate old franchises should be permitted to become a law in the guise of amendments to the railroad law. They should be in separate acts, so that their meaning and application are unmistakable.

This brief is supplementary to the protest made before Gov. Odell on Thursday.

County Detective Reardon, who at one time was President of the Anti-Policy Society, was complaining witness in Judge Cowing's court yesterday against Israel Farber of 45 Forsyth Street, who was on trial there for having policy slips in his possession.

Reardon was explaining the game of policy at some length when one of the jurors asked:

"What are the chances of the players in the game?"

William S. Coursey, who resigned as private secretary to Police Commissioner Greene on Wednesday, appeared in the Court of Special Sessions yesterday as complainant in the case which first brought him into public notice. The defendant is James J. Fleming, a Tenderloin cab driver, whom Mr. Coursey accuses of having assaulted him on last St. Patrick's Day.

Fleming asked for an adjournment so that he could bring Capt. O'Connor of the Tenderloin Precinct to court as one of his witnesses. Fleming said he also wanted the blotter of the Tenderloin Station produced to show that Coursey was a prisoner there at the time of the alleged assault. Coursey said he was going to Washington last night and the case was set down for May 19.

MR. BECK'S PLEA FOR WILSON.

Ex-Assistant Attorney General Says State Court Had No Jurisdiction.

Judge Foster, in the Court of General Sessions, was called upon yesterday to decide a novel question of law when ex-Assistant Attorney General James M. Beck came before him as counsel for Henry C. Wilson, ex-Chief Clerk of the Army Harbor Board, and entered a motion for the setting aside of a conviction for attempted extortion found against his client last week.

Mr. Beck argued that as Wilson was a Federal employe the Court of General Sessions had no jurisdiction in his case, which, he said, properly should have been tried before a Federal court. Assistant District Attorney Gans, who was in court to oppose the motion, said he would like to look up the law on the subject, and Judge Foster gave him until Monday. District Attorney Jerome last night said he considered the argument ridiculous.

DECISION FOR HOWARD GOULD.

Appellate Division Upholds Verdict in Valet Mowbray's Suit.

Howard Gould secured yesterday a decision from the Appellate Division, upholding the decision of the trial court in his favor in the action of Frank D. Mowbray, formerly his valet, who, having been injured by an explosion of fireworks on board Mr. Gould's yacht, sued for a breach of an alleged contract to pay him $80 a month for life.

On the first trial of the case Mowbray got a judgment for $5,000, on $25,000 demanded, but the verdict was upset by the Appellate Division. On the second trial the jury found for Mr. Gould, and that verdict the Appellate Division has affirmed. Justice Patterson, who wrote the opinion, said that the plaintiff's letters were inconsistent with the claim that a contract had been entered into and that there was convincing evidence that he was frequently intoxicated.

People's Palace Mass Meeting.

Charles Sprague Smith announces a mass meeting in Cooper Union to-morrow evening at 8 o'clock to form an organization for the establishment of the projected People's Palace in New York. Speakers will be F. X. Arens, A. J. Boulton, W. H. Baldwin, Joseph Barondess, John S. Crosby, J. B. Clark, Adolph Cohn, Frank Damrosch, Henry George, F. W. Hinrichs, Robert Hunter, Edward A. Moffett, Joseph Silverman, and Thomas R. Slicer. Frank Damrosch will lead the audience in singing "America," and messages are expected from prominent men throughout the country.

Prince Alfred Salm-Salm, Jr., Here.

Prince Alfred Salm-Salm, Jr., of Westphalia arrived on the Fuerst Bismarck yesterday, after having kept to himself absolutely throughout the trip. He engaged second cabin passage, primarily to avoid publicity, he said. So desirous was he of avoiding passengers that all meals were served in his stateroom. The Prince will remain in New York a few days and then travel about the country.

CITY'S RUBBISH AS FUEL

Representatives of Manufacturing Concerns to Inspect Result of Commissioner Woodbury's Experiments.

That the rubbish waste of the City of New York can be utilized as fuel is what Street Cleaning Commissioner Woodbury expects to demonstrate to representatives of the city, manufacturing concerns, &c., to-day. For some time past the Street Cleaning Department has been running an experimental station to test the fuel value of this rubbish at North Moore and Varick Streets, and the results obtained have convinced the Commissioner of the feasibility of his scheme.

"The rubbish waste of this city," he said, "heretofore has been disposed of by dumping it into the sea. In order to stop this dumping it had either to be used for filling in land or else burned. The second plan was adopted, and an incinerator was erected at Forty-seventh Street and the North River. From that incinerator, however, the heat derived was regarded only as a by-product, only enough steam being made to run the engine necessary to handle the belt conveyor. The other by-product is the ash, which has been given to the Park Department, and which is being used to fertilize Central Park. This material has value not only as a fertilizer but is also used in the manufacture of potash, its commercial value being about the same as that of Canadian wood ash.

"Now of the experimental plant in North Moore Street, we have derived there from the burning of these materials two horse power to the cubic yard; that is, one-half cubic yard of this material evaporates thirty-two pounds of water. The experiments of yesterday showed 1,500 degrees Fahrenheit in the combustion chambers, and in the base of the stack 600 degrees, while at the top of the stack the register was 90 degrees. There is no odor whatever from the combustion of this rubbish, as no garbage of any kind is used in the furnace. There is no smoke further than that of an ordinary house chimney. Thus you see, we use a product that has heretofore given the city no return, and we show that we can get a return. The plant will be inspected by representatives of the elevated roads, manufacturers, &c., so that they may be able to judge for themselves the value of the rubbish as a fuel. In Berlin, Paris, and other great cities not a bit of this rubbish is lost, it all being utilized to advantage, and New York can do the same thing.

"This line of work has been done by the department with the assistance of H. de B. Parsons, Professor of Steam Engineering in the Troy Polytechnic Institute; Mr. Hill, the Engineer of the Department of Water, Gas, and Electricity, and is now being conducted by Mr. Stearns, the Engineer of the Street Cleaning Department. It has been carefully watched by Battalion Chief Guerin of the Fire Department.

"Do I expect the city to make anything out of this? Well, if we can get rid of it for nothing the city will be that much in, while if we get one cent a yard for it, all the better. Your reporter's final disposition of this rubbish cost the city in 1901 $577,274, and in 1902 $547,011."

BOARD OF ESTIMATE MEETING.

Land for Bridge Plaza—More Pay for Mr. Jerome's Assistants.

The Board of Estimate met yesterday, but made no decision as to the $60,000,000 to $70,000,000 bond issues upon which the city will have to settle in a few weeks. The heads of the various departments have made requisitions for bond issues of more than $100,000,000, but the officials declare that only about $60,000,000 will be issued for permanent improvements this year.

Controller Grout was authorized to buy for $27,000 a lot on East One Hundredth Street, adjoining Public School 83, and the two buildings 219 and 221 Broadway, Brooklyn, for $39,000 for the Williamsburg Bridge plaza.

The board approved a request from District Attorney Jerome for authority to increase the salary of his assistants Garvan, Sandford, and O'Connor from $4,500 to $5,000 a year, and the salary of his private secretary from $3,300 to $3,900 a year.

Mayor Vetoes a Street Bill.

Mayor Low yesterday vetoed a bill passed at Albany providing that the whole cost of the opening of the short, narrow street from Chambers to Reade Street, just west of and adjoining the new Hall of Records, shall be borne by the city. He admits that the only property to be benefited by the new street is the Hall of Records, the American News Company, and the property on Reade Street directly opposite the opening, but points out that when the matter comes before the courts it can be sent back to the Commissioners of Estimate and Assessment, who can lay out a new district of assessment which will affect only the property owners he refers to.

Mayor Low's Vacation.

Mayor Low was happy after the meeting of the Board of Estimate yesterday at the prospect of a week's yachting trip on Chesapeake Bay. His yacht, the Surprise, has been sent ahead to Baltimore, where Mr. and Mrs. Low will go aboard. During the absence of the Mayor President Former will occupy the chair of the Chief Executive of the city.

Mrs. Annie Crissel Discharged.

Mrs. Annie Crissel of 4 Renwick Street, who was arrested in Long Island City on April 29, following a fight she had with her mother, Mrs. Eliza Paine, was arraigned before Magistrate Connorton yesterday on a charge of homicide, and discharged. The two women had been to Mount Olivet Cemetery to bury Mr. Paine. On the return they quarreled and struggled in the coach, and the mother had her daughter arrested for assault. That evening Mrs. Paine died suddenly in her apartments in First Avenue, and the daughter was then held on the charge of homicide.

$100,000 Verdict Affirmed.

The judgment on a verdict for $100,000, awarded by a jury in the Supreme Court to Jennie M. Leys and James A. Frame, executors of William Leys, who was killed in the New York Central tunnel accident on Jan. 8, 1902, was affirmed yesterday by the Appellate Division without opinion. Mr. Leys was superintendent of the store of B. Altman & Co. and he earned about $30,000 a year.

Rose Taken to Matteawan.

Henry Rose, who was indicted for the murder of his wife, Isabelle Rose, last September, and has since been adjudged insane, yesterday was taken from the Tombs to the State Asylum for the Criminal Insane at Matteawan.

Telling bits of strong color are especially needed in Summer furnishings. After the out-of-door glare, a touch of quiet tone is required to rest the eye, but only as a background. Against this, the eye, accustomed to the excitement of strong light, demands the stimulus of bright color accents. Outdoors and indoors should harmonize, not show absolute contrast.

Hotels and Boarding Houses in Colorado

There is a popular idea that prices in Colorado are inflated—that it costs money "every time you move."
The notion is not correct. You can live in Colorado comfortably and well for a moderate sum. At the hotels, boarding houses and ranches you can secure excellent quarters and capital fare for from $8 to $10 a week and upward.
Our Hand-Book of Colorado tells all about it. Send for a copy. It's free.
This summer we are going to make very low ticket rates to Colorado, so that people of moderate means may visit the American Alps.

TOPICS OF THE WEEK.

MR. HOWELLS is always in his most amiable and gentlest mood when he writes of contemporary American literature. In this mood he is the most conspicuous example of genial optimism now in the public eye. Viewed in this light, his article on "Certain of the Chicago School of Fiction" in the current North American Review possesses a definable and even a lasting value. It is a "document" not to be overlooked in "appreciating" the quality of Mr. Howells. As practical criticism, however, its chief merit seems to us to lie in its cordial recognition of Mr. Finley Peter Dunne, who had already been discovered, and upon whom a frequently heedless public had already showered honors. Mr. Howells's broadly comprehensive amiability in regard to the books of lesser men of this particular era is singular only because of his own unassailable rank as a writer of fiction of the best quality. It is not Mr. Howells's choice of subjects that has given him literary fame, but his manner of treating them; not his fondness for the commonplace, but the insight, the grasp of character, the deep human sympathy, the literary graces and rare facility of expression, arduously acquired and developed, which enables him so often to make the commonplace seem worth while. Famous novelists have not always been as generous with praise of their smaller contemporaries as he is. But his novels have made his fame, not his criticism of the novels of others, old or new, good or bad, foreign or domestic.

We noted last week some of the articles in the May magazines on Emerson. There is a particularly readable one in The North American Review by the popular English critic, Dr. Robertson Nicoll. An article appropriate to the Emerson centenary also, is a feature of the current number of Success. One of the most suggestive and original of all the articles on this subject, and one that may arouse a good deal of discussion in New England, is contributed to The Dial by Charles Leonard Moore. He calls Emerson "a master of maxims," essentially a preacher and a teacher. He doubts, in spite of Emerson's frequent allusions to philosophy, if he was "capable of forming a metaphysical concept." He finds no great central thought in his works, frankly places him lower in rank than Carlyle, and leaves the reader to infer that, in Mr. Moore's judgment, Emerson is also inferior to both Newman and Ruskin.

We publish to-day the second of Mr. Joseph O'Connor's admirably lucid articles in review of the new edition of Lecky's "Leaders of Public Opinion in Ireland." Mr. O'Connor's firm grasp of the subject, the sobriety of his judgment, and the spirit of absolute impartiality he has maintained have combined to make his articles noteworthy. Mr. Lecky's book, of course, has special interest at this time when the prospect of the passage of the new Irish Land bill by the British Parliament leads thoughtful men on both sides of the Irish Channel, and on both sides of the Atlantic, to hope that the burdensome Irish question is, at last, in the way of solution.

With its first volume still fresh from the press, the "Contemporary France" of M. Gabriel Hanotaux has already become a standard work, eagerly seized upon as a book of reference for every well-constituted working library. Opinions will differ, inevitably, as to the merit of the translation by Mr. J. C. Tarver, for it seems almost impossible ever to translate French into English so as to satisfy all critics who know both languages. Mr. Tarver's translation may fairly be called fluent and intelligible. It serves, and it is the best we shall get. And the first volume of the new history, treating of the stormy epoch of 1870-73, comprises a record of events so clear and comprehensive as to make it invaluable. This was the formative period of contemporary France, and, although M. Hanotaux has been a politician, and has shown himself a man of strong prejudices, he also has the self-control and the clearness of vision, and the sense of proportion required of the historian.

The suppression in London of the new edition by Israel Gollancz of "The Love Letters of Dorothy Osborne," on the ground that the publication infringed upon the copyright of a previous edition by Judge Parry of Manchester, is not the high-handed literary outrage proclaimed in many letters from irate scholars published in The London Times. In fact, Mr. Gollancz actually used the text of Judge Parry's book as the basis of his new, and doubtless vastly improved, edition, and this was a clear infringement of copyright. The question of copyright in manuscripts owned by the nation and preserved in the British Museum arose only in the letters published by The Times. Dr. Furnivall and other eminent men who took part in that controversy meant well, but as their rage has now cooled they doubtless see that the principle upon which the book was withdrawn from the market was one they all ought to uphold. Meanwhile Mr. Gollancz and his publishers are at perfect liberty to produce a new edition of the Osborne-Temple letters, but they must be careful to go to the original documents in the British Museum for their material and not use the work which cost Judge Parry much labor, time, and money, in the suppressed book they even reproduced some of Parry's blunders. Of course, most literary men think Judge Parry's interference ill-advised, but he saw fit to interfere and the law was on his side.

Reports of bad business in the book trade come from London, but such reports are neither new nor alarming. The London publishers are always complaining of the slowness of the booksellers in the United Kingdom, while the booksellers complain of the deficient public interest in books. All the same, the publishers of England have their town houses and their country homes, and their motor cars, and seem to thrive, in spite of perpetually bad business and the craft of the literary agents. In this country, it seems the book trade is generally cheerful and hopeful this spring. The Publishers' Weekly thinks, with the editor of The World's Work, that the circulation of popular books will be largely multiplied with the development of the machinery for distribution.

OXFORD.

JOHN CORBIN,

MR. LAURENCE HUTTON does not acknowledge any great assistance from local authority in preparing his "Literary Landmarks of Oxford." Oxford's ignorance of Oxford, he says in so many words, is phenomenal and startling. "A volume might easily be written on the subject of what Oxford does not know about Oxford." His sojourn in the university town was of only six weeks' duration. If he had stayed longer, his convictions on this point would only have been intensified and extended. A single volume would prove all inadequate for this great theme. An American student who had been baffled in his search of knowledge by the ignorance and indifference of the university librarian once exclaimed that what was not known about the Bodleian in the Bodleian would fill a library all but as large!

Yet Oxford has a way of sometimes knowing more than it lets on. When Mr. Hutton went to Trinity College to mark the literary land upon which Landor resided when expelled, (for discharging a shotgun at the window of a neighbor whose personal habits and conversation offended him,) there can be little doubt that he was subjected to a process of what is locally known as "ragging"—a rude custom which is not infrequently, in the case of Americans of a keenly inquiring mind, honored in the observance. "An unusually intelligent local guide in Trinity, when asked if he knew the rooms which Walter Savage Landor had occupied there, gave a startled look and confessed that his own name was Walter Savage Landor, and that he was the only Walter Savage Landor of whom he had ever heard as having had any connection with the college since its foundation, nearly four centuries and a half ago!" There can be no doubt whatever that this was an unusually intelligent local guide. It may even have been a not unintelligent undergraduate playing the guide, as Belinda played the piano, for her own amusement.

Landor's feat at arms is well known even at Oxford, for it is of the kind that especially appeals to the genius of the place. "I was only a spectator," says the poet himself, "for I should have blushed to have had any conversation with them, particularly out of a window. But my gun was lying on a table in the room and I had, in a back closet, some little shot. I proposed, as they had closed the casement and as the shutters were on the outside, to fire a volley. It was thought a good trick, and accordingly I went into my bedroom and fired!" An anecdote so characteristic of Oxford and of Landor is not likely to be forgotten of intelligent local guides. It might easier have been invented by them. "Who thought it a good trick," Mr. Hutton comments in his characteristic vein of dry and apt anecdote, "the poet does not say. The recipients of the shot did not like the trick, the authorities objected to it, and Landor was obliged to go elsewhere to fire his guns. It will be remembered that in later life he fired an obnoxious cook out of his own dining-room window at Florence, Italy, thereby, to his great regret, spoiling a tulip bed in the garden below!"

As regards the quadrangle or garden undergraduate, however, (and, and truth to say, even the landmarkable literary usually fall into this class,) local guides and dons are lamentably ignorant. A man moves into a room and a kindly underling of the college paints his name in large capitals over his door. An inscription on a monument to his memory could scarcely be more imposing. But on the day he moves out, after his four brief years are over, the unfeeling hand of the same underling, impersonal as death or oblivion, paints out his name and puts in its place that of his successor in the apartment, in equally grandiose capitals and destined to an equally certain oblivion. Over some doors the paint has swelled up into a mound, in which lie buried literally dozens of memorials of vanished undergraduate years. Are we more reverent of such memorials in America? If an eager English landmarker were to ask at Harvard to be shown the rooms in which Emerson, Holmes, and Lowell lived, would the professors to a man be able to satisfy his curiosity? And might not the unusually intelligent confidant aver that he himself was Oliver Wendell Holmes?

Certainly Mr. Hutton, without apparently going very

...ness into the established records of the colleges, have been able to fix many an interesting incident and to gather together anecdotes of Oxford and of Oxford men that otherwise must inevitably perish. The reason that makes us the richer when they read as lies open to the interpretation of Princeton, and throughout the point of view is that of the American college man. Later the lectures were digested into a magazine article, and now we have the whole compiled into a book that combines the virtues of lecture and article with those of a popular work of reference. The histories of Oxford and Cambridge, as Mr. Hutton remarks, are the history of the inception and consummation of the best English thought. The book is a valuable addition to any library of English literature. Its chief utility, however, will probably be as a guide to travelers already on the spot. The volume is illustrated by a number of admirable sketches of Oxford landmarks from drawings by Herbert Railton.

While nothing in his literary achievements, Mr. Hutton confesses, entitle of his literary illusions were shattered. He had always supposed, as most of us have also, no doubt, that Thomas Hughes and Arthur Stanley were as intimate at Rugby as were the Arthur and the Tom of "Tom Brown." But in 1900 Stanley wrote: "At the closing commemoration I expect W. Hughes and his wife. Have you seen him of late? I hardly know him before 'Tom Brown' appeared." After all, the fact is more astonishing than strange. Most pictures of friendship and love in literature were inspired by incipient friendships and loves that never reached fruition in life. If Tom Hughes had known Arthur Stanley as well as he wished, should we have had the present Hall picture of their friendship? Probably not; and especially if in real life it had been as ideal as in the story. Again, Mr. Hutton has discovered to his amazement that the author of "Verdant Green" spent but a few weeks at Oxford. He was a graduate of the College of Durham, a very dull and gray place by comparison. Isn't this a case of similar enlightenment? "Verdant Green," though essentially a caricature, is, as Mr. Hutton says, one of the truest pictures of Oxford life ever written. But if Cuthbert Bede, whose real name was the Rev. Edward Bradley, had lived through four years of Oxford, would his impression of the humor and the gayety of the life have been as lively and vivid?

There are certain minor errors in the book that a general prevalence of careless proofreading leads one to attribute to the printers. But Mr. Hutton alone seems responsible for nicknaming University College "Varsity." "Varsity is sometimes a crew and sometimes a football team. It never, even in a university, though there is often a touch of irreverence in it. But University College is Univ. as invariably as Christ Church is The House, St. Mary's Shimmery, and Magdalen Maudlin. Moreover, when Mr. Hutton calls the poet Wither George Withers, it is (to vary the excellent locution of Mr. Montgomery Schuyler) pretty clear who is "the galled darned John Cordon.

JOHN CORBIN.

Another Crockett Novel.

FLOWER-O'-THE-CORN. By S. R. Crockett, author of "The Stickit Minister," "The Raiderland," "The Grayer-of-Men," &c.; in two volumes. Pp. 411. 12mo. New York: McClure, Phillips & Co. $1.50.

"We've wandered many a weary foot" with Mr. Crockett since we were lured forth by the pleasant companionship of the stickit minister, and we cannot say that the foot histories lightsome as we pled along with "Flower-o'-the-Corn." The young lady to whom the author gives this somewhat cumbrous sobriquet is Miss Frances Wellwood, a sort of fille du régiment of "our army in Flanders." Historically, the story conserve itself with the first Marlborough, his men, English and Scotch, and those stanch and pathetic religionists, the Camisards. Romantically it follows the fortunes of Flower-o'-the-Corn and those of her envenomed rival, Yvette Foy.

The plot is ingenious and well sustained; but once too often have we met the situation of a hapless maiden forced into a marriage she loathes in order to save a man she loves; and once too often has kindly and opportune death prevented the consummation of the sacrifice. The crushed worm has turned. For the next offending author, Fair Rosamond's alternative!

Mr. Crockett has his public, and that public will no doubt enjoy his latest story, which, if poorer than his earlier tales, is certainly a far cry ahead of "Joan of the Sword Hand."

The American Sportsman's Library.

The plan of the American Sportsman's Library, published by The Macmillan Company, has been changed. Instead of comprising only twelve volumes, it will be complete in twenty. The fourth volume, on "Bass, Pike, Perch, and Others," by James A. Henshall, will appear May 13, to be followed, May 27, by "Big Game Fish," by Charles F. Holder. The new volumes will deal not only with shooting, fishing, and hunting, but will be devoted to the sporting dog and to the running horse; to trotting and pacing; driving and riding; yachting, small-boat sailing, and canoeing; baseball, football, rowing, track athletics; lacrosse, lawn tennis, wrestling, racquets, squash, fencing, boxing, and court tennis; skating, hockey, ice yachting, and sailing. Mr. Casper Whitney, the editor of the Library, has just returned to this city from a tour of the United States for the purpose of being present at important athletic or sporting meets and of keeping posted on everything in the field of sports that is going on. Mr. Whitney makes such trips every two or three years.

IRISH LEADERS.

JOSEPH O'CONNOR.

SECOND ARTICLE.

HENRY FLOOD, the first of the men presented by Mr. Lecky as a leader of public opinion in Ireland, is neither much deserves nor much loved; and he was on the wrong side of two issues of overwhelming importance, the revolt of America and the movement against religious proscription. The author says in summing up his career: "A few pages of oratory, which probably at best only represents the substance of his speeches, a few political pamphlets, a few labored letters, and a biography so meagre and unsatisfactory that it scarcely gives us any insight into his character, are all that remain of Henry Flood." Yet it is well to remember him as a pioneer in the attempt to create something like public opinion and genuine parliamentary government out of the chaos in Ireland after the Revolution of 1688. In that country the constitutional guaranties won and firmly established in England as the result of the revolution did not hold good. There was no habeas corpus act, no annual mutiny act, no security of tenure for Judges, no disability on pleasure as members of Parliament, no change of Parliament during a monarch's reign; and the government of the country was practically in the hands of the Primate and a few great officials, as the Lord Lieutenant spent little time in Ireland. The Irish Parliament itself was in subordination to the English Government. Under the Poynings act, passed in the reign of Henry VII., it was provided that the Irish Parliament should not be summoned till the measures upon which it was to act had been approved under the great seal of England, and that it could neither originate nor amend any bill, but might reject or approve it in the form submitted.

The practice previous to 1782 was to prepare measures in either house of the Irish Parliament, and then send them to the Privy Council in England, which submitted them to the Attorney General and the Solicitor General, to be returned for final action. At any stage a bill was liable to be rejected, amended, or altered, but when it had received the sanction of the great seal of England the Irish Parliament could make no change in it, so that its fate and its ultimate form were determined by the authorities in England. Besides this subordination of Parliament as a body, there was subordination in its membership. Out of 300 members of the Irish House of Commons, 216 represented boroughs or districts at the disposal of persons connected with the Government. The moment an opposition developed the Government resorted to every source of corruption—pensions, peerages, and other devices—and the narrow representative character of the Parliament was tainted with venality. It must be remembered that it was not essentially a popular body, as the mass of the people, the Catholics, were disfranchised, and were living under a penal code which imposed disabilities on them in politics, in religion, in the ownership of property, in education, in the professions. Finally, Parliament was powerless to aid the country in many vital matters. In commerce, freedom of traffic was denied, and every Irish product and manufacture, save that of linen, was put under restriction to prevent competition with English trade. To the Protestant patriots of Ireland, looking to the future prosperity of the country, such a condition of affairs was intolerable, and when George II. died, in 1760, and the Parliament, which had endured a generation, was dissolved, they were ready to assert the constitutional doctrine that an Irish Parliament should be more representative and independent, and that the country should be governed as Great Britain was governed, through the King, and his own lords and commons.

Henry Flood entered the Irish Parliament in 1759, when twenty-seven years of age, and he became at once a leader of the Opposition, among very strong associates. The purposes he proposed to accomplish were: the shortening of the duration of Parliaments; the reduction of the pension list, a source of social and political corruption; the creation of a constitutional militia, and the independence of the Parliament of Ireland. Under his leadership a measure for octennial Parliaments was passed in 1768; a party was created which kept the administration in jeopardy, and public opinion had been brought to bear on the conduct of political affairs. In the struggle for Parliamentary independence the leadership passed to other hands, for Flood made the mistake of accepting a lucrative office from the Government; and this, however pure his conduct, rendered his political action thereafter open to suspicion. Supply bills were still altered in England, a habeas corpus act was thrown out, as well as a militia bill, and a measure to secure Judges in their positions; and he looked on consenting. He supported the proposition to send 4,000 Irish troops to fight against the Americans, and called them "armed negotiators"; and Grattan, referring to the phrase, described him as standing, "with a metaphor in his mouth and a bribe in his pocket, a champion against the rights of America—the only hope of Ireland—and the only refuge of the liberties of mankind." The time came when he felt constrained to resign his office, but he never regained his popularity.

One of his poems in Mr. Lecky's first volume, his ode given on the repeal of Henry Grattan, spoil on that orator his instinct with unfailing enthusiasm. Grattan seems to be his ideal of Irish patriotism. The story of his life is told as interwoven with the aberrations and errors of a great age; no attempt to summarize it, said he made, and, happily, its main events are familiar to students of history. He became the leader in the movement for freedom of trade, and the restrictions on Irish commerce and manufactures were swept away. He became the leader in the agitation for legislative independence, and what is known as the Constitution of 1782 was granted, abolishing all control by the British Parliament over Irish affairs, establishing the authority of the King, Lords, and Commons of Ireland alone to make laws for the country, and making it a kingdom united to the empire only through a common sovereign, ruling with his consent. These triumphs were won, not merely by eloquence, by reason, by moral power. A display of force compelled concession. Great Britain was hard pressed in war; Ireland had been left without troops, and a military force known as the Volunteers was formed for defense against possible invasion from France, armed, trained, and well commanded. It was essentially a Protestant organization; professional men, merchants, and country gentlemen were found to serve in its ranks; the citizen soldiers carried with them their political opinions, and in due time asserted the rights of the nation with arms in their hands. England had no resource but to yield. While it was the peculiar glory of Grattan to lead in the accomplishment of these things, it may be said that he was a laggard in no good cause. He was active for parliamentary reform, for Catholic emancipation, for education, and every policy with a promise in it of justice or benevolence.

After a few years of unexampled prosperity under the new Constitution, the spirit of religious animosity was kindled and fostered in the country, the Catholic peasantry were forced into rebellion, and the scheme for a legislative union of Great Britain and Ireland into one kingdom was brought forward by Pitt. No doubt the common dread of the principles of revolutionary France and the danger of invasion and insurrection had great influence in making the way clear for such a policy, but it was eventually carried through an unreformed Parliament by the lavish expenditure of money and the indiscriminate bestowal of peerages and rich offices. No one has told this shameful story more effectively than Mr. Lecky. Grattan opposed the union desperately but vainly, and he prophesied to unbelieving ears the evil which it has brought. He is the hero of a lost cause, but his fame is assured, forever in his speeches. This book is rich in many passages of rare beauty, and it would be hard to find a piece of more masterly criticism than the analysis of Grattan's eloquence. After saying that he combined two of the highest qualities of a great orator to a degree that was almost unexampled, Mr. Lecky goes on: "No British orator except Chatham had equal power of firing an educated audience with intense enthusiasm or of animating and inspiring a nation. No British orator except Burke had an equal power of sowing his speeches with profound aphorisms and associating transient questions with eternal truths. His thoughts naturally crystallized into epigrams, his arguments were condensed with such admirable force and clearness that they assumed almost the appearance of axioms, and they were often interspersed with centres of concentrated poetic beauty which flashed upon an audience with all the force of sudden inspiration, and which were long remembered and repeated.

"Some of his best speeches combined much of the value of philosophical dissertations with all the charm of the most brilliant declamation. I know, indeed, none in modern times, except those of Burke, from which the student of politics can derive so many maxims of political wisdom, and none which are more useful to those who seek to master that art of condensed energy of expression in which he almost equaled Tacitus." Not less charming is the picture of Grattan in retirement: "All accounts concur in representing him in private life as the simplest and most winning of mortals. The transparent purity of his life and character, a most fascinating mixture of vehemence and benevolence, a certain guilelessness of appearance, and a certain uncouthness oddity both in diction and gesture, gave a peculiar charm and pungency to his conversation. Like his speeches, it was translated with epigram and antithesis, full of strokes of a delicate, original, and laconic humor, of curiously minute and vivid delineations of character, of striking anecdotes admirably though quaintly told. He had seen and observed much, and he possessed a rare insight into character and a great originality both of thought and expression." Lecky dwells with lingering fondness on his career; every mention of act or opinion is an encomium, every allusion to his character a tribute, and every touch in suggestion of his personality a caress.

The second volume covers the career of Daniel O'Connell, and it is more interesting than the first, because, although it deals with more recent events, the intimate details given are far less familiar to most of us. Mr. Lecky has little sympathy with O'Connell, but has spared no pains to understand his character, and he is fair in his statement of facts, suppressing nothing, whether good or ill, and suggesting a favorable interpretation even where he makes the universal application. His theories O'Connell's abilities condemn many of his methods, destroy the elementary delight the reader of his career, and, yet, picture him as a titanic figure. Almost every volume in the collection of special value the story of the negotiations with the Vatican and the Irish Bishops to secure to the British King, as a condition precedent to Catholic emancipation, the veto power on the appointment of Catholic prelates, is of this character. It shows how narrowly the Catholics of the British Empire escaped a secret bargain, hardly worthy to be called a concordat, whereby their religious independence would have been sacrificed by their own representatives, and some share of their civic manhood along with it. The passage describing the monster meetings of O'Connell in behalf of a repeal of the Union are masterpieces of picturesque historic narrative. The account of the development of O'Connell's complex character and the recurring endeavor to analyze it kindle the reader's speculative intellect into activity, though one misses the comparison of the liberator to Martin Luther, which was so striking a feature of an earlier edition of the work.

Mr. Lecky says of the elder: "The more I dwell upon the subject, the more I am convinced of the splendor and originality of the genius and the reality of the patriotism of O'Connell, in spite of the animosities that surround his memory and the many and grievous faults that obscured his life. But when to the great service he rendered to his country we oppose the sectarian and class venture that resulted from his policy, the fearful elements of discord and turbulence he evoked, and which he alone could in some degree control, it may be questioned whether his life was a blessing or a curse to Ireland." This passage remains as it was formerly written; and it seems to the reviewer that it was written in strange forgetfulness of the condition of things into which O'Connell was born. He did not create the hatreds of class and creed; he found them; and if there was no warfare it was because the oppressed did not dare to struggle. Even the Catholic nobles, when they ventured to ask for justice, spoke with a subservient and cowardly whine; O'Connell roused the simplest of his Catholic countrymen to a sense of manhood and the courage to demand his rights. The struggle for Catholic emancipation was bitter; but the responsibility lay with the English statesmen who promised it and broke their word, and with a lunatic King and his half-witted successors. Why should any one have refused so obviously just a thing? The tithe war kindled sectarian rancor; but it had to be waged, while men went about in the name of religion collecting tithes in kind from a poverty-stricken peasantry for the support of a church in which they did not believe.

The agitation for a repeal of the Union kept more than one country in turmoil; but the notion that lays its head to rest on an unsettled question must expect troubled dreams. Moreover, as Mr. Lecky points out, there was no narrowness in O'Connell's soul. He asked no more for his own creed than he asked for all creeds—freedom. He favored the removal of the disabilities of the Dissenters; he stood for the emancipation of the Jews. He did not ask self-government for Ireland and oppose it elsewhere. He wished the liberty of all nationalities; and he was the champion of the negro slave when the abolition party in Parliament consisted of himself and two other members. He was for universal suffrage long before it was the fashion, and he was for democracy, though the subject of a Queen. He was the leader in a great movement, but he would not consent that the good cause should be stained by a crime. He was battling against wrong, and yet he repudiated an appeal to force, declaring nothing to be worth the shedding of blood, and staked everything on the power of "the moral electricity of the continuous expression of public opinion concentrated upon a single point." No doubt he was at times violent in his language, and yet, as he himself said, to quote his historian, "He was the first apostle and founder of that sect of politicians whose cardinal doctrine is this: that the greatest and most desirable of human changes may be achieved by moral means alone, and that no human revolution is worth the effusion of one single drop of human blood. Human blood is no cement for the temple of human liberty."

Mr. R. N. Stephens, whose romances generally deal with brave wandering knights and fair ladies of the era of romance, lays his scene now in the Borough of Manhattan. The time is the present and the protagonist is a disappointed man. He has talent and industry, but fortune has frowned upon him. Mr. Stephens is particular to seek verisimilitude in careful descriptions of familiar neighborhoods. He aims to reproduce the bustle and excitement of New York, its architecture, its manners, its customs. The well-appointed flat, the boarding house, the hotel, the pseudo-Bohemian café, the chophouse, the waterside neighborhood are all recognizable. The personages are generally commonplace enough to seem perfectly natural.

The "mystery" seems to be something new in mysteries, and if we are willing to accept it for what it is worth we certainly will not quarrel with the manner of its presentment. Everything is likely enough except the explanation when it comes. What it is the reader must learn for himself. It would be grossly unfair to uncover the mystery in a notice of the book.

BRADDOCK'S ROAD.

Geographical conditions have much to do with the settlement of a new country. The French, when they made their landing in Canada, had for a road the broad St. Lawrence, and this noble stream bore them far onward. The Frenchmen reached the Mississippi without great mishap. Strategically, mountain ranges are great obstacles to progress. The Appalachian Range stood in the way of the advance of the settlers who had made their homes on the Atlantic Coast. True, there were the Connecticut, the Hudson, the Delaware, the James, and the Potomac Rivers, but these led to their sources among the mountains. The disadvantages, strategically considered, France suffered from in the long run, because her sphere of action in the West was too far removed from her base. If English progress was very much slower, it was, however, more certain, for it held fast what it had captured. But this English advance met with many disasters at the start, the most noticeable of which forms an epoch in American history and is known as Braddock's defeat. In the "Historic Highways of America," (Volume IV.,) Mr. Archer Butler Hurlbert devotes his attention to the road taken by Braddock.

It might be said, as far as the French are concerned, that "vaunting ambition o'erleaps itself." Who were the aggressors, French or English, is a difficult matter to settle. The case with the French was that they had the easier route, by means of the rivers, and so came earlier in contact with the slower English advance. The rivers, too, gave the French the certain advantages of preparation. Their forts could be sooner reared, manned, and provided with guns and soldiers. Then, too, they adopted the method of conciliating the Indians.

As the sub-title of the book indicates, Braddock's advance, the making of roads, and his final route form the main subject. The long-continued war between England and France had brought about but indifferent results. "But in America there was a prize which both of these nations desired, and which was worth fighting for—the grandest prize ever won in war." France had apparently all the advantages—that is, so far as any aggressive movement of the English was concerned. There were the dense forests and the mountains, which precluded any English advance. It was the formation of the Ohio Company that aroused France. Then it was known in England that the French were preparing for action, for a powerful armament was being fitted out at Brest. Now the British Ministry prepared for action. "The new campaign in North America was the conception of the Captain General of the British Army, the Duke of Cumberland, hero of Culloden. Four millions of pounds were given for military purposes, and Major Gen. Edward Braddock was appointed to the service in America upon the recommendation of the Duke of Cumberland. The character of Braddock has been variously described. All lauded his courage. Walpole had no liking for him, for he describes him in this manner: "Desperate in his fortune, brutal in his behavior, obstinate in his sentiments, intrepid, and capable."

In March, 1755, the English vessels with the troops had made a landing at Alexandria, Va. Colonial history informs us how little the Governors of the several Colonies had done for the maintenance of the troops. The plans laid out in England could not be followed out. "Instead of having everything prepared for him, Braddock found almost nothing prepared, and on what had been done he found he could place no dependence. Braddock wrote of his troubles:

> On the 10th of May I arriv'd at this place, (Frederick,) and on the 17th the train join'd me from Alexandria after a March of twenty-seven days, having met with many more Delays and Difficulties than I had apprehended from the Badness of the Roads, Scarcity of Forage, and a general Want of Spirit in the people to forward the Expedition.

There is this comment on a portion of the provincial troops: "Eleven hundred of which Number are Americans from the southern provinces, whose slothful and languid Disposition renders them very unfit for Military Service." Braddock lauds "Mr. Franklin, postmaster of Pennsylvania, and a Man of great Influence in that Province." Franklin had sent the embarrassed General 150 wagons and many horses. Braddock adds that Franklin "is almost the only instance of Ability and Honesty I have known in these Provinces * * *" The battle of the Monongahela has been so often described that it may not be repeated here. The victory for the French, it is believed, arose from the impetuosity of Beaujeu, who struck the English advance in a defile. The English fore was mown down by the Indians without the chance of the English returning the fire. We all know the part Washington took in this contest.

Mr. Hurlbert takes great pains in following out the road cut by Braddock through the wilderness, and points out the traces of the road as it exists to-day. Strange to say, this road became at the close of the eighteenth century the ordinary route of that vast number of brave men who sought fortune in the then remote West. "Less than one mile eastward of Chalk Hill, beside a brook which bears Braddock's name, beneath a cluster of solemn pines, lies the dust of the sacrificed Braddock."

A Book on Shrubs.

Miss Keeler describes all the shrubs from the region extending from the Atlantic Ocean to the Mississippi, and from Canada to the borders of the Southern States. Then she tells, too, of those particular shrubs found in our gardens, which are of foreign origin, and of the latter class it is curious to learn how many there are. The object of the work is partly to show how much may be gained by the use of shrubs in a decorative way, and how schoolyards and railway stations might be made beautiful by the planting of many of our wild shrubs. "It is to be hoped that the volume may lead to a clearer appreciation of the wonderful variety, the exquisite beauty, and the real value of that neglected part of native flora, the shrub." What is a shrub? Where does it differ from a tree? "It is simply a matter of one stem or many stems." The shrub may have any number of stems, the normal tree but one. There is then an individuality about the one-stemmed tree, whereas the shrub may have six stems this season, and two dozen the next. But if a shrub is cared for what does it give in return? The service the shrub renders may be various. Its beauty of flower may be one thing, but then it often bears fruits then, too, it embellishes waste places, and may act as a shield against the winds. It has a positive economic value, and one that is often overlooked. It is the conservator of water, it keeps the rains and prevents the denudation of the hillsides. Then, too, the fallen leaves are held by the growth of the shrubs, and so humus is made. Miss Keeler thinks that we show our ignorance in the overpruning of shrubs, when they are preserved for park or garden decoration.

Severe pruning tends to enfeeble both shrub and tree, and the removal of large branches usually interferes with the natural, and, therefore, more graceful lines of either. Shrubs will be in their best form and vigor the year through when no pruning is attempted beyond the thinning out of the weaker and overshadowed branches.

An extended index shows how large are the shrubs as to number and variety. Take for example, the roses. There are six species of American shrub roses, besides two or three more which have only lately crossed the border. Then, too, there are several which have apparently escaped cultivation, and have relapsed, as it were, into their original wild form. Our native roses are unstable as to color. They are red at the blooming and then fade. Sometimes they are sweet with their fragrance, but not always. They blossom without nectar, and the bee looks into them and is disappointed, but he finds plenty of pollen. Curious is the following up of the cranberry.

Does the study of shrubs teach us anything as to early geology? Botanists will tell you that the cranberry "is one of the plants which, since the glacial period, has returned apparently unchanged to its Northern home, and is found in Europe, Asia, and America, well up toward the limit of the timber line." Strange to tell of the mountain cranberry, the further north it is found the sweeter it is.

"Our Northern Shrubs" is a volume complete in every way, and the illustrations are of surpassing excellence.

Chaucer's "Troilus."

THE INDEBTEDNESS OF CHAUCER'S TROILUS AND CRISEYDE TO GUIDO DELLE COLONNE'S HISTORIA TROJANA. By George Hamilton, A. M. 16mo. Pp. vi.-180. New York: The Columbia University Press. The Macmillan Company, agents. $1.25.

This minute study is a dissertation for a doctor's degree at Columbia, and exhibits in the most characteristic way the scientific method of the study of literature. The subject is one that has been much discussed. In Chaucer's poem of "Troilus and Criseyde," he twice mentions as the author from whom he derived his story a "Lollius," from whose work he declares he has merely made a translation. Speculation has long been rife as to who this could be; for there is no such author in any language. The story of Troilus and Cressida was written by Boccaccio, and by a French writer Benoit; from the latter an Italian, Guido delle Colonne, made an impudent plagiarism in Latin. Chaucer knew Guido's work, and mentions his name in another of his poems. Different authorities have attributed the origin of Chaucer's poem to all three of these, as well as to the mythical "Lollius," which latter, in later times, began to be looked upon by commentators as an intentional mystification on the part of the English poet.

Prof. Hamilton has made a close examination of the poem and the sources, and has taken up in order the comment and criticism of all the writers who have discussed Chaucer's work. It seems to be beyond question that he took his poem chiefly and directly from Boccaccio, whom he did not wish to name; and for which reason he evolved a fictitious Lollius to stand as his sponsor. He is careful not to mention either the title of the work upon which he drew or the language in which it was written. As a matter of fact, however, he also obtained much material from Benoit and Guido; and it has been the chief part of Prof. Hamilton's task to point out what incidents he took and how he used them, through copious citations and detailed comment. His erudition and reading are both noteworthy, and no doubt the thesis is in the most approved scientific method. Its style, however, would add dullness to a treatise on calculus; of any suggestions of the charm of literature or of the personality and human nature of Chaucer there is no trace. Doubtless the author intended there should be none.

HARRY THURSTON PECK
Editor of the Bookman

"It is, in its way, one of the most remarkable books we have read in a long time . . . There is an undeniable power in it that dominates you for the time and makes you think of the power which Charlotte Bronte shows in the most memorable chapters of 'Jane Eyre.' There is a certain likeness between the two books, both in their defects and merits. . . . Its author has talent and something more than talent, and in spite of all the limitations which still hamper her she has written a book that one cannot readily forget or cease to talk about."

PRINCE CHARLIE.

"BONNIE PRINCE CHARLIE! "Even to-day hearts are stirred when the band plays 'Will ye no come back again?'" writes Mr. Andrew Lang. Strange as it may seem, there are snatches of Scotch ballads, sung in precisely those portions of mountainous Tennessee described by Miss Murfree, and the words show their Prince Charlie origin. Not that the Stuarts, or historic events, are in the least recalled, but as the great-great-grandfathers chanted the lines to appropriate musical phrases, so the descendants have remembered them. After Culloden there was many a Highlander who, driven from his home sought refuge in the Colonial wilderness. But was Prince Charlie "Bonnie"? Look at his portrait. It is the picture of a handsome young fellow. It was a proper compliment, for then he was in his prime. There may be some eccentric people in England who are still Jacobites, for not so long ago there was a meeting of such cranks described in the London prints. There are even enthusiasts who say, "If he came again, I would go with him." In his life of Prince Charles Edward Stuart, which just appears in a new and popular edition, Mr. Lang at the outset writes:

His figure is beheld in a lustre not its own, in the splendor of the love and loyalty that gave themselves ungrudgingly for him, and for his cause, that cherished his memory, and even now hold it a kind of treason to tell the truth. We are unable to find in Prince Charles the shining figure that bewitches our fancy in our childhood. But we can at least discern clearly enough the circumstances which made the Prince other than we would believe him; we can estimate his temptations, and unravel the complex web of events, trials, betrayals, disappointments, and insoluble perplexities, which thwarted, blinded, perverted, and finally ruined a gallant heart, and a nature kindly but never strong. . . . Charles is loved for his forlorn hope; for his desperate resolve; for his reckless daring; the winning charm which once was his; for bright hair, and brown eyes; above all as the centre and inspirer of old chivalrous loyalty, as one who would have brought back a lost age, an impossible realm of dreams.

Charles Edward Louis Philip Casimir Stuart was born in Rome on an Old Year's night, 1720. His name showed his mixed origin, his mother having been the daughter of Prince James Sobieska, Maria Clementina, the youngest of three sisters. A Russian Princess was at first wanted as a mate for the sober, demure James, but no Russian being obtainable the Sobieska was accepted. James, the husband, the son of James II., had no marked vices. As the Pretender, he was always awaiting to take his place as an English Sovereign. As the representative of Catholicity, he was supported by France, Spain, and the Pope. To keep up a semi-royal state, for he was pensioned by the Pope, undoubtedly money came to him from the faithful in England. His domestic character is good, only he did not know how to manage his wife, or, as for that, his children. Quarrels between him and his wife were constant, and finally the so-called Queen left him and retired to a convent. She was perhaps more Catholic than her husband, for it became more and more apparent to the Pretender that England could never again be made Catholic. Clementina bore two children, Prince Charles Edward, known as the Young Pretender, and Henry. The latter became a Cardinal.

The domestic wrangles of James and his wife caused much trouble among the Jacobites at home and abroad. Mr. Lang enters fully into the causes of difference between the two. As far as can be discovered, Clementina, save being a hot tempered lady, had not any grave faults. At last the pair were reconciled, but James's wife did not live long. In the meanwhile the young Prince grew up under many masters. The hangers-on of the Pretender vaunt the fine qualities of the boy. There were, however, continual squabbles in the household, and these must have been hurtful to the lad. His religious principles were by no means fixed. When Charles was thirteen his boyhood was practically ended.

He had certain accomplishments and could play on the violin and was a golfer of some merit, certainly a linguist, but the worst speller of English that ever lived. If Charles was ever to make an effort to regain the throne it was necessary that he should know something about the art of war. Spain then was besieging the imperial troops at Gaeta. The "Young Chevalier" saw now his first fight. The lad showed great spirit when under fire. He wrote to his father concerning the campaign, and calls his sire your "Grese" for "Grace." After the death of his mother Charles began his travels. Of course, every movement he made was closely followed by the English representatives at the foreign Courts. Mr. Lang writes that his "ambition was awakened; he longed for action. To his great joy his long hair was now cut (the operation was in August, 1737) and he was equipped with a wig." Charles loved sport and was fonder of his gun than anything else. He was a fine pedestrian and had much practice in walking without stockings or shoes. "His shining and popular qualities were superficial. He had been spoiled." When the occasion presented itself he was endowed with a fine courage.

During the seven years after 1737 the Jacobin cause in Europe had been neglected. There was trouble in England. Then began endless intrigues, and Walpole, as it is believed, for a moment favored the claims of the Stuarts. Anyhow, the time was deemed ripe for an attack on England, at the head of which Charles was to be placed. The young Prince left Italy in disguise, and after many adventures reached Paris. Accounts are here quite conflicting as to whether the Prince was received by the King of France. One day Charles would be certain that aid would be furnished him by France, and the next he was disappointed. Months were passed in uncertainties. James was afraid of disaster, and wanted his son back again in Rome.

Mr. Lang enters here into the political feeling in Scotland and the disposition of the Highland clans. Many of these clans were strong Jacobites, and from them Charles would receive aid, but their number was limited, not over 2,000. It does not seem as if the house of Hanover imposed any serious religious discrimination. Charles was informed what were actual conditions, and who were his friends in Scotland. The die was cast, and Charles sailed from Belle Isle on July 5, 1745, and a landing was made on the 25th at Moidart, in Inverness. He had but a handful of followers, only a small sum of money, and a few arms. There were some "duries" as he spells it.

It would be impossible to follow out in detail the actions of the Prince, whose audacity was superb. He faced Sir John Cope, the commander of the English forces, and drove him off the field. Prestonpans was a complete victory. James was proclaimed King. Men flocked to the Prince's standard and the force under his command was estimated to have been 6,000. Edinburgh was entered. Then there was a bolder move made into England. Now came the undoing of Bonnie Charlie. Unaccustomed to military discipline, the Highlanders left the ranks. There were many desertions. The Prince's forces were diminishing. Then, not precisely a retreat, but a backward movement, was advised. To this the Prince was bitterly opposed. He would win or die. The English forces were awaiting their opportunity. They found it at Culloden, which ended with the utter rout of Prince Charlie, and this was the last aggressive act of the Stuarts.

There always has been obloquy cast on the Duke of Cumberland for his cruelties during and after Culloden. Describing the lay of the land, and the positions held by the leaders during the battle, Mr. Lang writes, "A huge flat-topped boulder, behind the English lines, is said, locally, to have been Cumberland's final point of vantage. It is usual to stand on the top and curse the butcher." Charles has been blamed for leaving his men after their defeat. Why did he do so? Mr. Lang says, taking all evidence together: "It is plain that the instinct of self-preservation had now full possession of Charles." Now came the breakdown of Charles. Immoderate use of brandy helped to ruin him. Seeking refuge on the many islands of the coast, sometimes passing to the mainland, the Jacobite Prince lived a life of privation. Often he went hungry. Surrounded by spies, a reward of £30,000 being offered for his capture, it was only the loyalty of the people which saved him. Very cleverly does Mr. Lang describe the Flora Macdonald incident.

Here romance reaches a happy moment. The full moon and the late lingering daylight showed to each other two persons whose names live together as innocently as immortally—the fair and beautiful girl, brave, gentle, and kind, and the wayworn Wanderer, the son of a line of Kings. About them were the shadowy hills, below them the vast Atlantic plain. It was the crisis of Charles's wanderings, and he knew not how to escape from the hunters on the island, and the cordon of vessels in the creeks and along the shore. Here in the doubtful light and in the dim shieling he met his preserver. But the interview can scarcely have been accidental; a young lady was not out alone on the hillside, at midnight, by pure chance. Undoubtedly the arrangement had been made by Lady Clanranald, Lady Margaret Macdonald, and others of the Sleat clan, and with whose honor and sense of pity it did not consist that Charles should be taken by his pursuers within their bonds.

To get Prince Charles out of the way was Flora Macdonald's object. The Prince was made to don a woman's attire and to pass off as Flora Macdonald's serving girl. He was Betty Burke. Once the masquerader was almost discovered. There was a brook to be crossed, and Betty Burke lifted up her petticoats too high when she entered the water.

There was the necessity that there should be an heir to continue the Stuart line, and so Charles married Princess Louise of the house of Stolberg, and she had been a canoness. There is no evidence that she ever became a mother, at least to any child of her husband's. The dramatic person, Alfieri, became her lover after she had run away with him. As Mr. Lang has it, Alfieri was "much of a prig, though undoubtedly a poet." In a smaller way Charles was the imitator of the French Regent of unsavory memory, only it is not on record that the Regent ever struck any of the inmates of his harem, and such special blackguardism is laid at the door of Charles. In his old age, in the days of his decrepitude, when all his friends were ashamed of him, it was his daughter, Charlotte, of the Wilkinshaw scandal, who nursed him. Utterly broken down, Bonnie Charlie died of dropsy, Jan. 31, 1788.

MUSICAL EDUCATION.

THIS is a remarkable book by the talented French theorist and writer whose previous works have in recent years made a decided impression in their English form. The publest is perhaps not a novel one, but its treatment with such breadth and philosophic thoroughness and at the same time such practical directness, at such great length and to such technical detail, is surely an achievement that stands by itself. M. Lavignac has definite and concrete ideas that are the fruit of long experience, and he has an exact knowledge of all the different branches of music. He undertakes to set forth a definite scheme for the musical education of boys and girls in which he begins at the very beginning. Most of his remarks are full of sound good sense and real insight into the problem and the true pedagogical principles. With some others it is not so easy to agree; but M. Lavignac's view is in general so clear, his ideas so wholesome, that we could wish no better influence to be brought upon the community on behalf of the art of music than what a wide reading of his book would insure.

He begins with some general remarks upon the necessity of ascertaining first of all the natural aptitude of the boy or girl, and the early influences that should be brought to bear. The surroundings, the atmosphere, the musical culture of the family are highly important. Even a nurse who cannot sing in tune can spoil a child's ear forever. Early studies should be conducted systematically and logically, even though for only a short time each day—a self-evident proposition, one would think, but how seldom put into practice! No child should be put to the study of an instrument before six years of age. Our author's advice as to the manner in which, for example, instruction upon the piano should be begun is full of wisdom and good sense. How greatly he is to be thanked for insisting that from the very first great importance must be attached to obtaining good quality of tone! He follows it with similar discussions of the organ, the stringed instruments, the harp, the wood wind, the brass. He has sound advice as to the proper age to begin the study of each, which varies decidedly. The violin should be begun between the ages of six and eight; before sixteen a boy has not the strength for the double bass. The flute may be undertaken at ten or twelve; for the oboe, most difficult of wind instruments, fifteen is time enough; the clarinet is easier and may be begun earlier.

Part III. is devoted to the study of singing, and here M. Lavignac is equally sensible, acute, and suggestive. First is the value of his insisting that a singer must also be a musician—likewise an apparent commonplace, but far from a commonplace in actual life. When he comes to the details of method he is as perplexed and depressed by the complete divergence among most teachers, great and small, as most unprejudiced observers are. He is almost tempted to believe that Rubinstein's raillery was an expression of the truth when he said that, after all, "Nature was the best doctor and the best singing master." Seriously, however, he has the right idea when he says:

It is certain that we cannot be better inspired than with the ideas and procedure, if not the methods even, which are honored in every country of the old Italian school.

Then he gives a few practical hints on the study of singing, and in the course of his remarks he has some very sensible things to say about the use of the voice in speaking, which carried this study to the extreme of perfection.

There is still the difficulty of ascertaining just what this was or is, and of applying it. There is, furthermore, the higher study of employing the organ thus prepared as a means of expression, especially as to good diction, articulation, and pronunciation; for without these the voice loses much of its superiority over the instruments made by man. This is more good sense specially to be commended to singers.

M. Lavignac has the highest ideals for the training of composers. He speaks at length of the necessary technical studies, but these are far from being enough. His list of what a composer should do and study, from art and philosophy to travel and the observation of mankind, the intelligent reading of many books and listening to many plays, operas, and concerts, is enough to stagger the stoutest-hearted. To the rectification of an ill-directed musical education, a long chapter is devoted, with the premise that lost time can never be wholly recovered. There is much extremely practical and well-considered advice here; that for the amateur is especially good. To this chapter he has added a section giving a list of valuable musical books on all branches of the art. These are largely French, and it is unfortunate that the translator did not take occasion to add (with proper indication of her responsibility) others in English or even in German, which are more easily procurable and more widely available here.

Part VI. is devoted to a discussion of individual, class, and conservatory instruction. Private teaching is best for learning an instrument or singing; class instruction has the advantage in theory, solfeggio dictation, harmony, and counterpoint. Mr. Lavignac closes with a brief account of most of the principal conservatories of Europe, America, and Australia.

It is not a little remarkable that all this long and detailed discussion has been made so uniformly interesting by the charm of the author's style, his striking way of putting things, as well as by his wide experience that equips him with positive and well-supported opinions on all that he touches. It is edifying reading, and it is engaging. Miss Singleton has translated the book intelligently, on the whole, but has left a strong French flavor in her English. It is rather unfortunate that she is apparently not well enough versed in the technicalities of music to have substituted for many of the peculiarly French technical terms English ones, or others that are more generally understood by English-speaking people.

OLD ENGLAND.

"SOCIAL ENGLAND," the fourth volume of which has just appeared, is somewhat encyclopedic in character, and when completed will give in a connected manner the record of the English people in religion, laws, learning, commerce, science, literature, and manners. Each topic is presented by a leading authority. Literary events in the several reigns are carefully treated, and at the same time the industrial or commercial advance of England is shown. In a work of this character you get a more comprehensive idea of past conditions. Special chapters tell of the religious differences, and how these worked social changes. Beginning with the rule of the Stuarts, 1603, the conclusion has to do with William III., 1714. The text is fully supplied with illustrations, and the numismatist will find all the money of the time clearly engraved. Then there are shown many notable buildings of historic interest, with the portraits of the statesmen, authors, soldiers, and scientists of the past.

A good example of the information to be acquired in this volume is where manufactures are dwelt upon during the reigns of the two Charleses. It is not always convenient to consult Thorold Rogers's many works. In the thirteenth chapter of the volume two writers on agriculture and manufactures explain what was the progress made in the seventeenth century. The effects of the Huguenot immigration England feels to-day to her advantage. Economists were keenly alive to the benefits to be gained by offering the fairest terms to the French workmen. At the close of the seventeenth century, in consequence of English competition, the number of looms in Lyons had fallen from 18,000 to 4,000. "Before the Revocation England had annually imported £200,000 worth of lustrings, but by 1696 the English silk industry had grown so much that importation was totally forbidden." Paper-making in England owed its start to the French refugees. Before the immigration there was only one kind of coarse paper made in England. "All the finer kinds of paper for writing and printing were imported from France. * * * Refugees from Bordeaux and Auvergne introduced the manufacture into England." At one time all the hats made of beaver were manufactured in France. "So completely for a time did France lose the trade that the English factory at Wadsworth used to supply even the Roman Cardinals." At the beginning of the reign of Charles I. the only glass made in England was coarse bottle glass. "The refugees began the making of crystal glass and plate glass, and caused a great increase in the number of glass houses in and about London." In England to-day many of the common terms used in the making of glass show their French origin. Trade jealousies and strikes were not peculiar to the seventeenth century. There raged a bitter contest between the makers of woolen and cotton goods. When cotton and calico were worn the woolen makers declared that calico was an outrage.

The supporters of the woolen trade were often very violent, going as far in one case as to throw aquafortis at the wearers of the obnoxious calico. This "riotous and inhuman conduct" seems to have checked the trade for a time, as the calico printers complained their business had stagnated. Violence and legislation were the only two things that could check the wearing of calico as the material, according to Defoe, cost but one-eighth of the price of the woolen goods. A tax was imposed on printed calicoes in the reign of Anne, and in 1720 they were totally prohibited. No doubt the prohibition was generally popular in England.

Tariff questions of to-day might find their solution when old processes are examined. In 1622, so as to encourage the woolen trade, there was a proclamation issued forbidding the burying in linen. Very interesting are the tables of prices from 1000 to 1642. During the thirty-three years oxen had risen in price from £6 9s. to £9 8s. A horse was worth in 1606 £11 10s. 2d. In 1642 £13 18s. 10d. Wrought iron had risen from £1 12s 9d. to £3 6s 8d. The effects of commerce are shown in pepper. At the beginning of the seventeenth century pepper cost 4s 9d. the 12 pounds, and in 1642 had declined some 6s. Mr. J. M. Rymer's chapter on "Trade and Finance" is of particular value. Here is an estimate of the incomes of certain classes:

In the interesting estimate of class divisions made by Gregory King in 1688, he reckons the nobility and gentry at 16,400; merchants, clergy, lawyers, and civil service, 10,000 each profession; "liberal arts," 15,000; officers of army and navy, 9,000. He puts the average income of a knight at £280; an Esquire, £160; a gentleman, £200. These sums of money must be multiplied fivefold or sixfold to be expressed in modern equivalents.

As to the settlement of the Jews in England Mr. Rymer writes:

In Manasseh Ben Israel's interview with Cromwell and his Privy Council he laid great stress on the increase in English exports and imports which the settlement of Jews in London would probably produce. He explained the importance of the exchange and banking transactions they were now carrying on from Holland, and showed that the large capital committed to their care by the Spanish and Portuguese Jews, who thus hoped to save it from the Inquisition, enabled them to lend out money at what was then considered the extraordinary rate of 6 per cent. These arguments must have been specially appreciated in a country whose merchants were at once envious of a low rate at which their Dutch rivals could borrow, and desirous of extending their trade into all parts of the world. The Privy Council was divided on the subject, but the Judges decided that the laws did not prohibit Jews from living in England, and Cromwell then gave the required permission on his own authority.

The social upheavals of England, culminating with Oliver Cromwell, were the protests against the tyranny of bad and dissolute Kings. The reign of Charles I. was almost Spanish in character as far as relates to the robbing of the public purse. Morals were of the worst. No wonder there was a Puritanical revolution, and then better days dawned on England. Particular attention is devoted to the ways of the courts. There was that noted spendthrift Buckingham.

It was common with him (Buckingham) at any ordinary dancing to have his clothes trimmed with great diamond buttons, and to have diamond hatbands, cockades, and earrings; to be yoked with great manifold knots of pearl. * * * At his going over to Paris, in 1625, he had twenty-seven suits of clothes made, the richest that embroidery, lace silk, velvet, gold, and gems could contribute, one of which was a white, uncut velvet, set all over with diamonds, valued at £14,000, besides a great feather stuck all over with diamonds, as were also his sword, girdle, hatband, and spurs.

This was the period when the periwig was worn.

It is said that at the beginning of the reign of Charles II. a modified form of periwig was worn by men who were anxious to conceal Roundhead principles, for the huge French periwig had not yet come into fashion. Aug. 29, 1663, Pepys writes: "Had some thoughts, though no great desire or resolution, to wear a periwig yet." By Oct. 1 he had bought two at £3 and £2 each. "I have worn neither yet, but will begin next week, God willing." The King and Duke of York had not yet begun, and Pepys's nerve was sorely tried when he first wore his, though, as he found, without reason. As a rule the pattern worn by Louis XIV. was the favorite—very large, dark, and curly. Powder was not much in vogue, though Dryden speaks of white wigs.

Queen Catherine arrived in England in her Portuguese farthingale, but soon laid it aside for the English dress. She did what she could to keep the dresses short, as she loved "mightily" to have the feet seen. When the King determined on the vest and tunic, a coat to the ankles was talked about for women, but trains became the fashion in 1663. Mrs. Stewarts's hat was cocked and had a red plume, and hatband feathers were usual. In May, 1666, Mrs. Pepys went out in her fashionable "yellow birdseye hood." Straw hats were only worn by country women. Not much jewelry was worn, pearls alone being fashionable. The buying of dozens of pairs of gloves, perfumed with jasmine and rosecake, in the shop of the New Exchange, was the favorite form of extravagance.

Dinner was generally at 1 o'clock. Pepys's dinners, as he gradually made his way in the world, form a series as interesting to us as to him. Jan. 28, 1659-1660, he gave a homely party, and had a dish of marrow bones, a leg of mutton, a loin of veal, a dish of fowls, three pullets, and a dozen larks, all in a dish; a great tart, a neat's tongue, a dish of anchovies, a dish of prawns, and cheese. A pretty dinner. March 26, 1662, was served in courses after the new fashion: "A brace of stewed carps, six roasted chickens, and a jowle of salmon, hot, for the first course; a tansy, and two neat's tongues, and cheese, for the second course. April 4, 1665, he gave a really grand dinner: "Fricassee of rabbits and chickens, a leg of mutton boiled, three carps in a great dish, a great dish from a side of lamb, dish of roasted pigeons, dish of four lobsters, three tarts, a lamprey pie, a dish of anchovies, good wine of several sorts, and all things mighty noble and to my great content."

Those were not the days of temperance.

There was an endless variety of drinks. Of Spanish wines the most usual were Canary, sack, tent, Malaga, Muscadel, and sherries; Florence, Burgundy, Navarre, and Rhenish wines and claret are also often named. The only spirit in common use was brandy, but it was too costly to be popular. Of fancy drinks, methoglin, hypocras, red wine sugared and spiced, and aromatic, sweet drink; of ales, "mum," brewed with wheat instead of hops; buttered ale, beer brewed without hops, warmed and flavored with sugar and cinnamon, with butter in it; "lamb's wool," ale with the pulp of apples, were favorites. It is said that in 1688 more than 12,000,000 barrels of beer were brewed to supply a population estimated at about 5,000,000. Water was scarcely ever drunk, even by children, who drank small beer from their earliest years.

London streets in the days of Charles II. were unsafe. Robbery was frequent; there were "hectors," and "nickers," with "scowrers," who assaulted people for their own amusement, and there were hired bullies, who murdered in the "execution of private acts of vengeance for the King and others." Education then was at least peculiar. Both Davenant and Locke found fault with the English methods. It was not thought proper to have a child intimate with its parents. The style of address of a letter then when a son wrote to his father was, "Hon'd Father, Sir." The army and navy are fully presented, and there is no topic that is not elucidated. In conclusion, too much praise cannot be given to "Social England." Careful research and scholarship are apparent on every page.

Miss Anne Hobson.

The author of "In Old Alabama," Anne Hobson, is a niece of Capt. Richmond Pearson Hobson, the hero of the Merrimac episode in the Spanish-American war. She is a descendant of Chief Justice Richmond Pearson of North Carolina and the great-niece of Gov. Morehead of North Carolina. On her mother's side she is the great-granddaughter of Senator John Williams of Tennessee. The Hon. Hugh Lawson White, who ran for the Presidency against Van Buren, was her great-uncle. Her father is Judge J. M. Hobson of Brownsborough, Ala., one of the most popular men of the Alabama bar. He was Captain during the civil war. Miss Hobson's story is one of negro dialect. Miss Mouse, "the little black merchant," tells the stories, which centre around herself. The illustrations are photographs taken from life.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

ACCORDING to my deity, the story of the impeachment of Andrew Johnson is one of the most contemptible incidents in the history of the United States. If the morality of the President are to be believed, a ruler whose measures were without parallel in subtlety or unblush ideas was suffered to plunge his just forward. On the showing of his friends, an honest, manly, upright above all things in devotion of the Constitution to which he had pledged his allegiance, was the victim of cruel persecution and defamation by party spite. If the truth lies somewhere between the two, the whole affair seems to degenerate into a sordid squabble hampered by hypocrisy.

Yet such a history as that traced so carefully in Mr. Dewitt's volume appeals to other readers than those who are interested merely in the curiosities of political intrigue. For in the light there thrown upon the Administration of President Johnson we find revealed issues not only of importance but of living importance. No one can appreciate the present attitude of the South on the question of negro suffrage unless he understands the Presidential and Congressional policies, respectively, of that period. Incidentally we are supplied with material for reflection on the question, always more or less urgent, of the admission of Territories to Statehood. Especially does Mr. Dewitt's study enlighten us on the grave subject of the relation of the Executive authority to the legislative, a subject as capable, in the event of lack of judgment on either side, of causing National confusion to-day as forty years ago.

The author of this volume writes with the confidence of a man who has all the details at his fingers' ends. By permission of a daughter of Andrew Johnson he has had the privilege of examining a series of scrapbooks compiled by Col. Moore, one of Johnson's private secretaries, from contemporary documents, periodicals, and newspapers. In addition he has, of course, studied the reports of Congressional proceedings in The Globe, but there are few references to the historical text books. Apparently Mr. Dewitt has relied mainly on direct documentary evidence. With this mass of data as his authority, he has written in a clear and connected style what is practically a history of the whole of the Johnson Administration. There is little or no attempt at "fine writing," yet the prevailing literary manner is by no means commonplace. Mr. Dewitt excels in character sketches. His portraits of Stevens, Sumner, Wilson, Black, Butler, Curtis, Evarts, and the mysterious Stanton make a remarkable gallery. In some cases they appear at first to be strongly colored by the writer's own opinion, but that impression is lessened after a study of the whole book. For instance, the sketch of Sumner appearing on Page 33 is so utterly different from one's general notion of his character that it seems malevolent and unjust, but if, after reading the part played by Sumner in the impeachment, and especially the extracts from Sumner's own speeches, we turn again to Mr. Dewitt's characterization we find it quite in keeping with the record. Very dramatic, too, is Mr. Dewitt's description of the more striking incidents in the conflict. He is particularly successful in conveying to the reader the atmosphere of suspense during the secret session of the Court of Impeachment, and the breathlessness with which the calling of the roll was followed at the critical moment. It must be a dull reader whose pulse does not quicken as the Chief Justice reaches the name of Senator Ross.

But this book was evidently intended to be much more than a series of literary pictures. It aims at vindicating the reputation of Andrew Johnson, not by special pleading, but by a disentanglement of the facts of the case from the many rumors and misapprehensions which were spread abroad at the time. The task is accomplished mainly by straightforward historical narration. That Mr. Dewitt has succeeded in his object may be inferred from the fact that the leading impression of Johnson's character left upon the reader as he closes the book is of the wonderful dignity of the President under great provocation. It is surely one of the ironies of history that the very virtue in which his accusers charged him with being conspicuously deficient should stand out from a later memoir as one of the points in which he notably excelled his contemporaries. Yet such is the figure that appears from this history, and it cannot be overthrown unless the facts here given, and apparently supported by the best authorities, are shown to be misquoted.

Mr. Dewitt begins with a statement of the problem of reconstruction after the war. He expounds the various solutions suggested and shows that the policy adopted by Johnson and his Cabinet was similar to Lincoln's. Next follows the meeting of the Thirty-ninth Congress, which receives the President's message with approval. The chapter entitled "The First Veto" indicates the beginning of disagreement. The Freedmen's Bureau bill is disapproved by the President, who objects to it as unconstitutional on the ground that it is passed by a Congress containing no Senator or Representative from the States mainly to be affected by it. In a speech at the White House to a mass deputation of the Republic. And this first impeachment movement, on the removal of the Chief Magistrate, if successful would have been established on the most fatal character, constituting a perpetual menace to the stability of our Executive, a spreading blight upon our character and growth as a Nation, a standing reproach to the republican form of government, and gradually leading to a National habit of capricious political speculations to put one President in the place of another, such as have disgraced some of the republics of Central and South America." Never again, he proclaims, will a President of the United States be impeached unless the offense of which he is accused is clearly non-political, and commonly intelligible to a high sense of misdemeanor.

These three men, Hillel, Akibah, and Judah gave to the Jews, by means of rabbinic literature, that strength of purpose which has enabled them to endure centuries of subjection. In barbarous Russia it was only yesterday that many Jews were murdered, and yet the Israelite keeps steadfast to his belief in a merciful God. Uneducated though many of them may be, that is in modern ways, they still retain the memory of the past, for they know what are their records, and are satisfied that nothing but the Divine will can ever remove them as a power from the face of the earth. Oral tradition never kept together a race or a people, and it is in great measure the Talmud which has been the cement which has held together the many fragments of the ruined past.

Mr. Adolph Danziger, in his "Jewish Forerunners of Christianity," traces the history of the Talmud, and his endeavor is to show who were the masters of Israel. Critics, not theologians, are taxed with irreverence when they insist that oral tradition was the foundation of all beliefs. As a sequence it follows that, as in folklore, the gold and the commoner metals are so closely amalgamated that the separating process becomes quite impossible. The truly religious Jew of the time of Hillel was the slave of the laws of tradition. So it happened that there was a dispute as to the precise date of the first day of Passover. As it fell on a Sabbath, the law forbade the sacrifice of any animal on a Sabbath. The Talmud said to one opinion, and many of the Sabbaths were of a different opinion. It was then that Hillel stepped to the front and declared what was the law. As the Talmud has it: then the Babylonian Hillel was chosen President of the Sanhedrin, "to restore peace in Israel."

Of all the famous Jews, Hillel was the most liberal. This story is told of him: Once a heathen came to him, who asked to be taught "all the laws of Hebrews while he would stand on one foot." Hillel took the slacker by the hand and said:

My son, in so a good Jew thou oughtest to know but one principle, and that I can teach thee in less time than thou requirest. That which is hateful unto thee do not unto thy neighbor. This is the fundamental principle of the Mosaic religion; all the rest is mere commentary. Go and live up to that.

Mr. Danziger presents many arguments in relation to the crucifixion, and charges the Sadducees with having brought about the death of Jesus.

The rabbi Jesus is the most heroic, the greatest, the noblest personality of all time and age. Even in the shadow of Golgatha let us, however, be just and not lay the charge of the great crime on those who did not commit it. It was not the Mosaic law nor the Jewish people nor the great body of teachers, the Pharisees, who steeped their hands in the blood of Christ. That was exclusively the work of the Sadducean high priest and his servile adherents, of men who had usurped by fraud the succession of Aaron and used it as a means of heaping up wealth by oppression; who were the tools of Rome, not the representatives of the religion of Moses; murderers in the name of Jewish law, which they despised alike and their creed and their lives. The Jewish law did not and could not sanction the death of Christ.

Scriptural text is the framework of the Talmud. It teaches those who read it "to learn, endure, and pray." It has had an existence of eighteen centuries for a people without a country. Mr. Danziger's conclusion in his eulogy of the Talmud is: "Without the Talmud, the light which illuminated the darkness of nigh two thousand years' wanderings, the Jew could not to-day show a history which is the grandest expression of tragedy the world has ever seen."

"Essays on Great Works."

Henry D. Sedgwick, Jr., is writing a volume of "Essays on Great Writers," which Houghton, Mifflin & Co. will probably bring out in the Autumn. There are eight essays in all, chiefly reprinted from The Atlantic Monthly. The author deals with such men of letters as Sir Walter Scott, Thackeray, Macaulay, Montaigne, and Cervantes.

A Lad of Old Plymouth.

Any new work of fiction by Quiller-Couch is always welcome. In a season of many novels of mediocre quality "The Adventures of Harry Revel" is thrice welcome. It is a spirited tale full of imagination and humor, full of "derring-do" and fabulous, grotesque figures, and with a good enough plot to serve. It is pertinently true that to the murder of Rodrigues in his splendid house on the Barbican in old Plymouth; to the hunted outdriver, the theatrical mariner of his life, and his equally theatrical death in Crooked Redcross after the siege; to splendid fireworks of Latin and weak Anglo-Saxon; Flintstones, the resentful reader will be apt to say "Yeah!" But the experienced reader has had too much of the novel of incident lately, has been surfeited with the strange coincidences, the stirring encounters, the mysteries and melodramas of romance, historical and otherwise.

It must be confessed, however, that Mr. Quiller-Couch can do this sort of thing much better than many of his most successful contemporaries; while the whimsical humor, the apt and original characterization, the large measure of originality in his books, and especially in this, surely atone for a small share of the purely conventional in plot and incident.

The place is Plymouth in the beginning of the last century. Plymouth, with its terraced Hoe, its Barbican and Citadel, its vast expanse of beautiful harbor, its discoverers, seafaring folk, and soldiers. We see it all, though there is no strenuous description—the quaint houses, the busy streets in the Napoleonic era, when the Peninsular war and the fear of invasion kept militant England busy; the outlying districts of the Hamoaze and the Tamar, St. Budeaux and Saltash, before Isambard Brunel built his iron bridge to unite Cornwall and Devon.

Harry Revel is a foundling and his adventures are strange. He is, perhaps, eight years old when we first know him and he is only fourteen when he leaves us with scarcely a word of farewell. In four of the intervening years he has seen wonders and done wonders, while his stark-naked race through the night, by water and land, over hills and through briars, from the lugger Glad Tidings to the home of that ineffably sentimental creature, Isabel Brooks, is something new in fiction.

We are to see more of Harry Revel. There is a distinct promise, toward the close, of further adventures. We have no doubt that in some book, as yet unwritten, he will turn out to be of blood as noble and pure as that of another famous foundling of picaresque fiction, Marryat's Japhet Newlands.

Some of the other personages in this new story are entertaining enough to make one desire to meet them again, especially Benjamin Jope, the sailor man, who engineered that wonderful funeral for his shipmate Bill; Mr. Jack Rogers, J. P., blind Major Brooks seeking consolation for the sorrows and disappointments of his life in Virgil; Trapp, the chimney sweep, and his cantankerous wife, and the Pengelleys. "The Adventures of Harry Revel" is a story far out of the common.

New York Landmarks.

A LANDMARK HISTORY OF NEW YORK. Also the Origin of Street Names and a Bibliography. New edition, with an introduction containing an account of the establishment in 1653 of a popular form of government in New Amsterdam. By Albert Ulmann. 16mo. Pp. xxx.-385. New York: D. Appleton & Co. $1.25.

The experiences of George, Tom, and Emily, with their friend Prof. Williams, who knew all about the queer and out-of-the-way facts of New York City history and their records in existing landmarks, have clearly aroused an interest among young people, and very likely among older ones. A new edition of Mr. Ulmann's entertaining book, which was first published about two years ago, is sufficient evidence of it. The new issue is enlarged by an introduction describing the rapid march of political events on the Island of Manhattan from the time when Peter Minuit bought the land from the Indians in 1626 to 1653, when the States General issued their order establishing the form of popular government in New Amsterdam. The new burgher government consisted of a "Schout," who was Mayor, District Attorney, Chief of Police, and Sheriff rolled into one; two "burgomasters," who were the principal dignitaries, church wardens, protectors of the widows and orphans, and keepers of the city's seal; and five "Schepen," who constituted the civil and criminal courts. The form was attractive; unfortunately, in practice, the strenuous Stuyvesant quite subverted the intention of the States General, and coolly retained in his own hands the appointment of all these officers, instead of submitting their choice to the people.

Mr. Ulmann has told the story concisely in a dozen pages, without the help of George, Tom, Emily, or even the professor. This quartet, whose conversations and rambles among the historical parts of the city make up the body of the book, are full of entertainment and instruction. Prof. Williams says truly that most New Yorkers of to-day are one-sided—they are either east siders or west siders, and know little of the other side of the town; and it is only by poking your nose into out-of-the-way corners that you can discover the landmarks of old New York. This is emphatically what the little party did, whose adventures are described by Mr. Ulmann. From the Battery to Harlem they forgot nothing that could suggest historical events, characteristic features, and episodes in the city's social life, or their influential in it. Historic sites have been carefully located in numberless instances; there are reproductions of old prints and maps, and photographs of existing sites and buildings, new and old.

There is an appendix that conveys much curious information in describing the origin of many of the street names in New York—names that are a mine of historical suggestions; there is a bibliography of books relating to New York City history, of biographies of the most important New Yorkers, and of works of fiction involving New York surroundings. Mr. Ulmann is to be congratulated not only on the manner in which he knows New York history and topography, but on the ingenious and entertaining manner in which he has presented it. This book is the best for New Yorkers and for entertaining visitors to the city.

"NATURE LOVERS"

There is a curious thing about the habitual love of "Nature." It seems not to prevent but to promote in certain souls a feeling not at all lovely or loving toward fellow-victims of the passion. We shall not call this feeling hatred, for that is a good strong name for a manly sentiment, reserved by sensible people for some object of intrinsic and considerable importance. A man might with self-respect really hate for a reasonable time another who had supplanted him in the affections of his first love. He might mildly hate a relative whose character and conduct were intolerably disagreeable, but not quite bad enough to justify total disregard of the ties of kinship. He might with propriety hold something like hate toward a hopeless snub nose who rendered his hours of longed-for ease a period of unavoidable torment. The feeling we have noted in the writings and presumably in the hearts of certain nature-lovers is not of the sort inspired by these substantial grievances. It appears rather spiteful than cordial, more hateful than hating, and has for its root a singular jealousy of an indefinite but acidulous kind.

As we have intimated, jealousy, where a human mistress is involved and where love may logically inspire love in return, which cannot be shared with a rival, is all right, whether we consider the impulses of human nature or the conventions of polite society. But the lovers of Nature cannot decently claim an exclusive right to the responsive affections of their idol. They cannot in truth expect any affection at all from that exceedingly impersonal and indifferent thing the name of which is capitalized and represented by the pronoun "she" by a purely arbitrary effort of the imagination and the will. It was all well enough for the fanciful infant races to personify Nature or its features and to people the earth with lovely or terrible creatures, with the great god Pan to stand for the whole outfit, and it is permissible for civilized men to indulge in sweet or solemn play-acting in the same sense. But it is not easy to see how so thin a sentiment as this harmless occupation may arouse should develop into jealousy of others engaged in it.

Yet as a matter of cold and amusing fact, the lovers of Nature are in the thick of as pretty a quarrel as ever raged around a ballroom belle on the lower east side. Not the first, perhaps, but the most conspicuous entry into the lists was made by the venerable John Burroughs, who is the dean of Nature lovers in this country and was at one time apparently the high priest of the cult. In a recent article in The Atlantic Monthly he took—seized, we might say—the opportunity to criticise with great plainness and some acerbity the qualifications of Mr. Seton-Thompson and the Rev. William J. Long to officiate in the temple of Nature and to bring to her altars the tributes of truthful and accurate praise. He even went to the point of intimating that their motives were not of that complete purity and unselfishness which should prevail in the hearts of the worshippers of Nature, that they told marvelous stories which could not be verified, could not even possibly be true, just to make their readers sit up and pay attention. Obviously such an attack could not go unnoticed, and Mr. Long has resented it with a counter attack in the current number of The North American Review quite as severe in tone and damaging in intention as that of Mr. Burroughs. When the latter gets back from his jousting with the President in the Yellowstone Valley and his scrapes and lofty tumbling with wild animals of the forests, we must doubtless hear from him again. Meanwhile here is a message from Mr. Long's article which reveals the queer mental atmosphere in which the true lover of Nature works and fights: "Above and beyond the world of facts and law, with which alone Science concerns itself, is an immense and almost unknown world of suggestion and freedom and inspiration, in which the individual, whether animal or man, must struggle against fact and law to develop or keep his own individuality." There you are. The man who confidently can make such statements as that is beyond the pale of ordinary criticism, and we leave him to Mr. Burroughs, warning the latter, however, that his antagonist does have a pretty strong grip on facts when he gets down to them.

LOCAL LITERARY "SCHOOLS"

Poe once remarked, in one of his critical, otherwise bilious, moments, that the "Bostonian critics" must think poets were porpoises, they were so fond of representing them as running in "schools." Therein Poe, who at the time happened to hold a sectional "Southern" literary brief, unamiably displayed the same foible which the "Bostonian critics" displayed amiably. The gist of the strictures of The Southern Literary Messenger's disparagement of the Bostonians of that day was that they formed a mutual admiration society, a coterie or clique which puffed everything that came out of Boston, without strict attention to its merits. So they did. But so did he everything that came out of "the sunny Southland." Only they did not puff their heroes and heroines rancorously and invidiously as he did his. They had never heard of his, while he resented having had to hear of theirs. And they have been justified of posterity, which has heard of the objects of their admiration, while it has man-aged comfortably to ignore the objects of his. It is amusing to look over Poe's prophecies of greatness for the chosen of his magazine, and to think that they are remembered only by his mention.

But the point is that all this local, still more all this sectional estimation, is provincial to the Bedlingtonian point. When it is sectional it is apt to be worse than provincial as being malicious. Malice is quite the last quality that anybody in his senses would attribute to Mr. Howells, unless it were provincialism. Wherefore one wonders what should make Mr. Howells describe some recent books that to the casual reader do not seem to have anything in common as "examples" of "the Chicago School of Fiction." And what in common have Mr. Fuller and Mr. Dunne, and Mr. Ade and Miss—we really forget the lady's name, and The North American is not at hand—excepting their habitat? We did not know they had even that. And we do not see that it is the least matters. And why should a man's habitat be, in any case, thrown in his face when the question is of the quality of his literature? Mr. Fuller, to be sure, happening to live in Chicago, employed his powers of observation and expression in two novels of which the subject matter was the life of that town, that is to say, the material at hand. Excellent novels they are. But he had employed the same qualities before in another novel which Mr. Howells now describes as one of "Vain Thoughts," but which, if we misremember not, he did not disdain to enjoy and publicly to praise, as to his honor, he does not to praise whatever he enjoys, when it appeared. And what single phrase was there in the earlier book that would "give away" its author as a Chicagoan, or a New Yorker, or any provincial, even "metropolitanly" provincial thing? If Mr. Fuller had discovered such a passage, he would undoubtedly have deleted it with haste and shame. Mr. Dunne, as "Mr. Dooley," writes about Chicago because he lives there, and prefers to write about what he knows best. But what has that to do with it? Might not his Irish-American have expressed the same sentiments in the same words if Mr. Dunne had encountered him in Boston or Philadelphia, or if pent-up Utica had contracted his powers? What, for example, had or have Lew Wallace and Edward Eggleston and Maurice Thompson and Booth Tarkington in common, except their place of original residence, that one should go to lump them as "the Indiana School" and to pretend to distinguish them from their fellow-craftsmen of the riparian States?

What we want of our writers is, as Rufus Choate said about Daniel Webster, that they "should feel one throb of a heart expansive of our whole America." As a novelist, we all recognize this transcendency, whether of Bostonian effetiveness or Western Reserve in Mr. Howells himself. We should like to see Ogden Ti in him as a critic also, especially now that he is owning to be a "Bostonian," or to strike the dossers with Mr. Stedman, and thus to speak with something of a factitious authority. We should like to hear the accents of the godlike Dan'l himself, as he exordiated: "I wish to speak to-day not as a Massachusetts man nor as a Northern man, but as an American," and then went on to assure us, from that breadth of view, that the work in immediate question was good, or "no good," as the case might be. But to tell us that it exhales the peculiar charm of South Boston or reeks with the effluvium of West Hoboken really gets us no forrader, and belittles the whole business of literary criticism by provincial and fantastic distinctions.

The Brown Sale.

Messrs. Sotheby recently sold in London the library of the late John Taylor Brown of Edinburgh. Dr. Brown owned two precious books—the Kilmarnock Burns, in uncut condition, and John Keats's "Poems," 1817, and "Lamia," 1820, each in the original boards, uncut, with the paper label. The Burns, which brought the large sum of £830, was totally uncut, measuring 8 by 5⅝ inches, and had the end blue paper cover. The title-page and next three leaves had been supplied from another copy, however, and were inlaid and mended, but the text after the preliminary leaves was described as being in very fine and clean condition. (The record price for the book in 1873 5s., given in February, 1896, in Edinburgh, for A. C. Lamb's remarkable copy, in the original paper covers, uncut, and with the last two leaves not cut open.) Keats's "Poems" sold for £160, and the "Lamia" for £68, both being notable prices. The record price for the "Poems" is £117, given last December for the copy, also in the original binding, which Keats gave to his friend, B. R. Haydon. Another presentation copy of the book given to Charles Cowden Clarke, and with manuscript notes by Mary Cowden Clarke, sold for £122 at Sotheby's, March 16, 1903. The latter was rebound in calf, and was cut down. The price just paid for the Brown copy is, therefore, the second highest sum yet given at auction.

Fine Dickens Collection.

Thursday, May 21, Sotheby, Wilkinson & Hodge will sell in London William Keimeys Hart's collection of the works of Dickens, comprising one hundred items. Among the best are "Sunday Under Three Heads," 1836, in the original wrappers; "The Library of Fiction," 1836-7, twelve of the fourteen numbers, containing "The Tuggses at Ramsgate" and "A Little Talk About Spring and the Sweeps," the only contributions by Dickens to this work; "Sketches of Young Ladies," 1837, in the original pictorial boards; "Pickwick Papers," 1836-7, in the original parts as issued, (lacking only the advertisements for Parts I., II., and IV.,) each number bearing the date 1836; "The Loving Ballad of Lord Bateman," 1839, in the original cloth; "Sergeant Bell and His Raree Show," 1839, in the original cloth; "To Be Read at Dusk," 1852, morocco, uncut, and "Nicholas Nickleby," "David Copperfield," "Bleak House," "A Tale of Two Cities," &c., each in the original parts, with wrappers, as first issued.

More Bismarck Letters.

"Bismarck Briefe," just published in Berlin, contains letters written by the great Chancellor in 1870 and 1871, to his wife. There is a great deal in them about Bismarck's two sons, Herbert and William. Says a London reviewer:

They both fought in the war, and both rode in the terrible cavalry charge of Mars La Tour. Herbert was shot through the hip and badly wounded, while his brother was thrown from his horse but not hurt, and was able to go through the campaign to the weary end. It is distinctly droll how the old Chancellor worries everywhere and every one to find out how his sons are going on in order to send news to their mother. It was natural enough, perhaps, but even the very regiments laughed. The old Chancellor is always referring to the merriment his inquiries after his sons excited among their colleagues. For instance, writing from Clermont on Aug. 27, 1870, he remarks, 'Did I tell you that every dragoon in the Third Squadron begins to laugh when I examine him about Bill?' It must have seemed amusing, because Count William was the heavyweight of the regiment and, it would seem, very well able to take care of himself, a proof of which was afforded by the fact that he was the first of the Germans to ride into Essen.

PAUL DU CHAILLU.

PERSONS who knew the late Paul du Chaillu many years are inclined to doubt the statement of some of the biographical dictionaries, accepted by writers of obituary notices in some of the newspapers of May 1, that the distinguished explorer and author was born in New Orleans, July 31, 1839. Allibone gives the date as 1835. There is a story that he was back in Paris and Paris cannot in this country in 1852 in search of a stage of adventure and shipped from the west coast of Africa. The folks who believe this story insist that young du Chaillu was then already known as the author of some striking articles on the Gaboon country. It does not seem likely that a lad of fourteen years could have written these articles, or even a youth of seventeen. It is quite as unlikely that a youngster would have been placed in charge of a valuable cargo on a long voyage. Some of the obituary notices say that du Chaillu first went to the west coast of Africa in his eighteenth year, which, according to their record, would be in 1856. Allibone says he went to Africa in his childhood, and was in this country in 1851. There are people living, and in full possession of all their faculties, who met him here about that time and heard him tell stories of African life.

One of these gentlemen writes to us that, as a stripling, he was a delighted guest at an informal dinner party in Philadelphia in the early fifties. Paul du Chaillu was present and entertained the company hugely with his narratives. He seemed, to the stripling, to be a man of twenty-five years. Of course, he may have been an exceedingly mannish youth. He was not called upon to state his age, but he was certainly not a lad of fourteen.

But whatever may have been the real age of Paul du Chaillu at the time of his death in St. Petersburg, there is no dispute as to his preservation of his faculties to the very end. He was always intellectually alert and in good spirits. He published a new book it seems only the other day. When the gentleman who remembers meeting him in the early fifties last saw him, a few years ago, he did not look more than sixty. Du Chaillu was then as lively and as full of anecdote as ever. The talk turned upon the reputed intelligence of monkeys, and some one present, quoting a recent magazine article, told of an ape, temporarily sojourning in a European zoological garden, who had been taught to row. Du Chaillu vigorously disputed this statement. He held that the anatomical construction of the simians was such that they could not be taught to imitate the motion of rowing. Another argued that zealous training could accomplish wonders. The dog, he said, was not naturally a draught animal, yet not only in France, Holland, and Belgium, but in the arctic regions, that animal was successfully employed to draw heavy loads. Du Chaillu refused to recognize the point of the argument, and insisted that it would require countless generations of development to make a monkey a good stroke oar.

In the public mind Du Chaillu has always been associated with the big monkey. As the hunter of the gorilla and entertaining introducer of that dreadful beast to civilization in the sixties, he first came into the ken of the general public. He was widely known as the man who had discovered the gorilla, because he wrote and talked so entertainingly of the big monkey, and his stories led Barnum to seek for a gorilla. To seek, with Barnum, was to speedily find. He could always find anything he wanted, animal, vegetable, or mineral. Somehow, in the gorilla matter, Barnum contrived to link Du Chaillu's name with his own. Yet this always good-humored traveler and story teller was no mere sensationalist. He had a habit of finding wonderful things, just as Barnum had, and he always told good stories. But the world derived instruction as well as entertainment from his books and lectures.

Perhaps, in spite of the long memory of our informant, the date of Du Chaillu's birth in Allibone's Dictionary of Authors is correct. There are boys of seventeen, now and then, in real life as well as in story books, who can do the work of men. Such boys, to be sure, frequently waste their energies in their youth and turn out to be commonplace men. But Paul du Chaillu was exceptional in many respects. The world has lost much in losing him. As a writer he was always readable. His habit of looking on the bright side of things lent a certain lightness of tone to his descriptions of travel. In his lectures his personal charm counted for much.

J. J. Bell, the author of "Wee Macgreegor," is now in London, reaping the harvest of popularity following his sudden success. He is engaged on a sequel to his humorous study of Glasgow life.

The latest success in London weekly journalism is called "V. C.," the popular abbreviation of Victoria Cross, the most coveted reward of military valor. H. Perry Robinson, managing director of the house of Isbister & Co., had twenty years' experience in the publishing business in the United States, whence he derived the idea of this paper. Two hundred thousand copies of its third number have been sold. Its tone is high, and the spirit in which the paper is edited reminds the reader of President Roosevelt's "Strenuous Life." Negotiations are on foot to publish an edition of "V. C." in the United States.

The Isbisters will soon publish Amos R. Wells's "Help for the Tempted." The Rev. F. B. Meyer, a leading Nonconformist of London, writes in the warmest praise of this book. E. B.

An article on Findlay Douglass's style in driving, J. F. Taylor's views on "The Art of Putting," and the revised rules of the United States Golf Association help to make Golf for May an unusually interesting number.

Appropriate to the revival of "The Eastern Question" are two articles in The Chautauquan for May, "Saxon and Slav: Two Imperial Creations," by Frederic Austin Ogg, which treats of the outreaching of the Russian and British Empires, and "Western Siberia and Turkestan," by George Frederick Wright.

Noteworthy articles in The United Service for May are "Gainesville, 1862," by Gen. Charles King; "Capitan Constancia," by "an officer's wife," and "The Evolution of Army Reforms," by Gen. William H. Carter.

Arthur Stringer writes in the May Craftsman on "William Morris as I Remember Him." He says: "With all his dreams of Socialism, there was a touch of the aristocrat about William Morris to the end. Cambridge, twelve years before his death, had taunted him with the charge that he made books and tapestry for only the wealthy and well-to-do. It was charged that his things were costly and far beyond the reach of the poor, about whom he prated so much. Yet it was his awakening to the fact that the poor had neither the taste nor the opportunity to grasp at the beauties of life, as expressed in art, that first swept him from his rock of passive aristocracy into the turbid waters of Socialism as he defined it. Culture, wealth, and friendship of such spirits as Rossetti, Burne-Jones, and Madox Brown, a youth that had been steeped in the gray loveliness of Oxford, a home that was all beauty and peacefulness, unlimited opportunities for immersing himself within his own palace of art—all these were not enough to anchor him to a life of mere art and aristocratic indifference. 'Oxford,' he once said to me, 'taught me the need of beauty; Stepney taught me the need of humanity.'"

"The Life and Adventures of 'Jack' Phillip, Rear Admiral U. S. N.," by Rear Admiral Stanton Maclay, U. S. N., will appear in four monthly parts in a memorial magazine called The Illustrated Navy, the first number of which is dated May, 1903. The others will be published in June, July, and August. Mr. Maclay writes to us: "This laudable effort to erect a fitting literary monument to the memory of that gallant sailor and Christian gentleman, Rear Admiral Philip, has been handsomely supported by navy people. Everything has been contributed gratuitously except the actual expenses of publication." Barrett Philip assists Mr. Maclay in the editorial work. The May number contains an epigraph by President McKinley, dated Sept. 1, 1900, as follows:

Admiral Philip's distinguished service in the war with Spain won for him a high place in the regard and affection of the American people and was a fitting climax to his many years of duty faithfully and most efficiently performed.

His untimely death will be long regretted not only by those who were intimate with his sterling character and genial personality, but by all to whom his name and fame were known.

Capt. A. T. Mahan contributes an introduction, and there are chapters on the career of Admiral Philip by Rear Admiral Balch and Mary Philip Wheelock, the hero's sister. The number is handsomely illustrated.

Peter Macqueen contributes an uncommonly interesting article on "The Troubles of Finland" to Donohoe's for May. Father Matthew Russell, S. J., writes entertainingly of Sir Charles Gavan Duffy. One of the pictures is a reproduction of Sassoferrato's "Madonna of the Rosary," which was stolen from the Church of St. Sabina, in Rome, last Summer.

Charities for May contains several articles relating to the National Charities' Conference in Atlanta. Edgar Gardner Murphy, W. H. B. Du Bois, Edward T. Devine, and Mrs. Florence Kelly are among the contributors.

Fingerposts in History.

The study of history is to be made more intelligent and the resulting knowledge to be of a broader range by means of "General History Way Marks," by Charles C. Boyer, author of "Psychic Initiative in Education." This is a 200-page book of "predigested" history, meant to supplement such works as those of Myers, Duruy, &c., in the schoolroom. All detail is eliminated, the logical connection of events, the genetic philosophy of the world's records, are emphasized. The author says in his preface that general history texts are stretched to forbidding proportions in the attempt to give all the information. In trying to conquer a million of details thus offered to the student, he becomes a memory slave and misses the vital thing in the study of history, the inter-relation of events. Mr. Boyer hopes that by means of his "shorter text rather than a skeleton outline the writer may have succeeded in directing learners to points of most importance from the thought side, redeeming them at the same time from aimless memory work. * * * As a thought companion, holding the pupil to the logic of events and guiding his judgment in his cumulations of facts, details, names, places, &c., this text ought" to be extremely useful in secondary schools. Each country, each nation, is taken up separately, and the prominent features of its history sketched rapidly and largely. The effect is that produced by the better class of historical novels, with this difference—Scott and Dumas make us feel acquainted with the prominent men and women of bygone ages; such a book as this illuminates the family life of nations. There is no index, for "it is intended," says the author, "that teachers using this book as a basis of lesson assignments shall require students to work out the lessons in connection with larger texts, in which cases the index of the authors in question will have to be faithfully consulted." (J. B. Lippincott, 65 cents.)

The School Garden.

A book on "How to Make School Gardens," from the pen of H. D. Hemenway, Director of the Hartford School of Horticulture, will be published within the fortnight by Doubleday, Page & Co. The little volume is based on actual experience, and is said to be written clearly and simply. The author deals with the preparation and fertilization of the land, root grafting, budding, greenhouse work, potting, shifting, taking cuttings, &c.; gives "Twenty-one Lessons in Garden Work—May to September," tells "How to Make a Garden," and provides a bibliography. The illustrations consist of eight full page half tones and many smaller drawings showing the methods of making out gardens, tools used, and so on.

Ralph Henry Barbour's New Book.

A new college story entitled "The Land of Joy," by the author of "The Half Back," "For the Honor of the School," "Behind the Line," and other stories, Ralph Henry Barbour, is announced for publication the middle of this month by Doubleday, Page & Co. This is the author's "first full-fledged" novel, and describes the love stories of two couples. Much of the action of the story takes place at Leesburg, a quiet old-fashioned place about thirty-five miles northwest of Washington. Mr. Barbour is a native of Cambridge. He was educated at the Waltham New Church School and at the Highland Military Academy of Worcester. When he was nineteen he entered journalism on a Boston paper, but left it after six months. He then worked for The Denver Republican. Later he was court reporter for The Colorado Sun. He was at one time literary editor on The Denver Times, combining with the duties of that position those of cartoonist. In 1899 he joined The Chicago Inter-Ocean as copy editor. It was during this time that he published "The Half Back." He has written verses for Puck, Life, Truth, Harper's Magazine, and other periodicals.

Important London Sale.

Messrs. Sotheby's sale of May 18-21 should be one of the most successful auctions of the present London season. Among the notable books in the first day's sale is an original Columbus letter, "the second edition," according to the cataloguer, whose description is hardly definite enough. There are a number of rare examples of early English literature, among them being Bentley's "Monument of Matrons," 1582, with the blank leaf marked A1, (the Blainforth copy, which brought £69 many years ago;) Braithwaite's "Shepheards Tales," 1621, in old vellum, "probably the rarest of his early works, the Huth copy being hitherto the only known example"; Chalkhill's "Alcilia," 1613, containing a "letter written by a gentleman to the author, his friend," signed "Philartes," which Corser thought was written by Isaak Walton, the author of "The Compleat Angler" being only twenty years of age at the time; and Chettle's "England's Mourning Garment," no date but 1603, slightly stained, but perfect, with the fore-edges uncut, said to be the only complete copy that has been offered publicly since the Corser sale in 1867.

The second day's sale contains a fine copy of Defoe's "Robinson Crusoe," 1719, Volumes I. and II., in the original calf; John Gay's copy of Dryden's "Annus Mirabilis," 1667, with his autograph on the fly-leaf, "John Gay, 1713"; Gray's "Odes," Strawberry Hill, 1757, uncut, with the half title, Garrick's stanzas, "To Mr. Gray on His Odes," being included; Drant's "Medicinable Morall," dated 1566, a large and fine copy of the first English translation of Horace; and Wynken de Worde's edition of "Bartholomeus de Proprietatibus Rerum," printed about 1495, and the most magnificent specimen of his press. The latter lacks a blank leaf in A, and eight leaves at the beginning and five at the end are in fac simile; otherwise it is in excellent condition. The Ashburnham copy, with the first and last leaves in fac simile, sold for £185 in 1897, and the Davis copy, also defective, brought £212 in 1900.

The third day's sale includes a remarkable volume which contains Shelley's "Proposals for an Association of Those Philanthropists Who, Convinced of the Inadequacy of the Moral and Political State of Ireland to Produce Benefits Which Are Nevertheless Attainable, Are Willing to Unite to Accomplish Its Regeneration," (1812,) and his "Declarartion of Rights," a broadside, printed about the same time, each of these being of excessive rarity, most of the copies having been seized by the Government. The present copies are sewn together in one cover, with three important letters respecting them at the end. The first edition of Milton's "Paradise Lost" is represented by a fine copy in the original sheep, with "the first title page," a few trifling wormholes in the corners of the last five leaves. A "unique" volume, described as "hitherto unknown to all bibliographers," is "A New Yeares Gift: The Courte of Civill Courtesie," translated from the Italian by "S. R." (Simon Robson?) a large copy, but with some leaves stained. The 1591 edition was sold at the Corser sale for £21 15s., and is now in the Huth Library. It has been described as the only copy known.

Walton's "Compleat Angler" is represented by a remarkably large copy of the first edition, measuring 5 11-16 by 3¾ inches, in a fine contemporary English binding of black morocco, richly gilt, paneled sides, the centre and corners of acorn scrolls. The blank fore-edge of the title page has been repaired, and some leaves have been soiled by handling. The binding is a most elaborate one, and has been preserved in fresh condition. The general state of this copy is fine, the angler's song having full margins. This precious volume is to be disposed of in the fourth day's sale.

Bishop Hurst's Books.

Bishop John Fletcher Hurst of the Methodist Episcopal Church, who died in Washington May 4, was known as a bibliophile. He is supposed to have left an important collection. The most important book ever owned by him was probably "The Whole Booke of Psalmes Faithfully Translated into English Metre," printed in Cambridge, Mass., in 1640 by Stephen Daye. Familiarly known as "The Bay Psalm Book," this work has long been precious in the eyes of collectors by reason of its being the earliest extant specimen of printing in the Anglo-American Colonies. Only ten copies are known to exist, six of the number being imperfect. Bishop Hurst's copy was one of the latter. Dodd, Mead & Co. recently purchased it privately for about $2,500, and the book is now part of a Brooklyn collection.

Norse Heroes.

"Heroes of the Norsemen," by Katharine F. Deuel (The Macmillan Company, 50 cents) tells anew and briefly ancient tales of the Volsungs and the Vikings and the men of might who flourished in the twilight of the Gods. Sigurd, Volund, Harvar, Leif, and Harleif, who found America and called it Vineland; Ragnar Lodbrog, and Frithjof are among its heroes. The stories are well told without superfluous words. The book is well printed and prettily bound in stamped blue leather, while the illustrations, including a frontispiece in colors, are commendable.

WHEN TO PUBLISH.

For many years it has been the custom to publish as many books as possible in September, October and November, so that perhaps 3,000 or 4,000 new books are issued in these months, and practically none in January and none in the Summer.

On January 15th we published THE PIT, by Frank Norris, though it was said that the trade would not buy just before stock taking. The "closed season" did not hurt the sale, however, rather the reverse, and now we have decided to publish an equally important book, equally "out of season," namely:

THOMAS DIXON, JR.'S
(Author of "The Leopard's Spots,")
NEW NOVEL, ENTITLED

on August 1st, 1903. The booksellers will then have leisure to find out about the book, the papers to review it and advertise it, and the public to hear about it—when it has the field to itself. It is, we believe, a good time to publish a great work of fiction—trade tradition to the contrary—and we invite dealers and all interested to send for further particulars.

THE LAND OF JOY.

Last Fall a manuscript came back from four readers, who voiced with one accord the statement that each had greatly enjoyed it and prophesied its success. Such a verdict MEANS Success. The book was written by Ralph Henry Barbour, the author of many successful college stories. We agreed with the readers, and we have yet to find a soul who has not taken real delight in the story. We believe it will bring genuine pleasure to thousands, and renew the youth of every one who has been to college. (Ready May 15th.)

FROM READERS.

The New York Times Saturday Review of Books:

AS LAWYERS, in the issue of May 2, stated Mr. C. Whitfield Smith, in the Quarterly of Improving the reading matter of the cheap magazines by introducing such a class of articles as would attract a class of necessary readers. The man (or woman) of a magazine like that about to be undertaken from every desk of his acquaintance, and the price of publication need not deter one from the purchase of such a course. Many authors that have had the first hints of successes can be traced to a trifle, and no one can be unable for a trifle, and no thing calculated every phase of thought, from the study of exemplification (religion as the polity and growth of institutions, States, and, mediating enactments, the interpretations of the work of poets, novelists, historians, scientists, critics, theologians, and philosophers, the pleasure of delving into such mines is bound to have instructive echoes in the memory.

To-day I wandered into one of the free circulating libraries that embellish and glorify our city streets, in order to read what W. D. Howell, a most eminent critic, had to say about Emerson and his place as poet, philosopher, and sage, in the pages of The North American Review of May, 1903. While there I encountered a very vivid treatment of "The Work of Mrs. Humphry Ward," by Hamilton W. Mabie in the April issue of that review. The highest reaches of his interpretative skill can only be apprehended by the man or woman of scholarly tastes, yet this essay contains such a groundwork of sane, tempered criticism that the veriest tyro of knowledge can follow his appeals and appreciate the dicta laid down with ease. These two articles were read by me in the short space of time I was able to abstract from my lunch hour and at absolutely no cost, as I am a subscriber to the library.

Frederic Harrison shares with Leslie Stephen the honor of being considered among the most eminent thinkers of the present day, and I have long made the practice of reading everything that issues from his fertile brain. In a Nineteenth Century of June, 1900, bought for one-quarter of the original price, I found an article by him on "Style in English Prose." The theme is weighty and provocative, but in his hands it is convincingly illuminated, though one can find a little of the trite in some of his allusions.

Among a great many others I mentioned a Forum of February, 1892, the cover of which was dignified by the name of one of the foremost historians of the present time, W. E. H. Lecky. His subject seemed especially appropriate to my mind, as he discoursed very knowingly on the "Art of Writing History."

The fourth or fifth name whose mind is ever entertained with the functionings of knowledge can find words at any and all times to garnish and obtain it. The world of ideas is to him a living force that rides and steers, containing nourishment for the heart, guidance for the mind, and serene satisfaction and contentment for the soul. If a young man is without means for him not despair, but let his aim to live the intellectual life by tireless striving and purification of the spirit, and by a studious preference in his reading for only the best literature on which professed critics have set the seal of approval.

The Use of Capitals.

The New York Times Saturday Review of Books:

I am emboldened, on reading the article "Mr. Ade," contained in this week's NEW YORK TIMES SATURDAY REVIEW OF BOOKS, to ask the following question, at the risk of being sent back for my answer to a kindergarten: What is the present rule, if any, for writing the English language with regard to the use of capitals? In my school days the rule taught was simple enough; all sentences and all proper names were to begin with a capital letter. In the German language the rule was and still is equally well defined, in that all sentences and all nouns (Hauptwoerter) were to begin with a capital. To-day and for some time past there seems to be no fixed rule observed in the use of capitals. I do not advance Mr. George Ade's writings as a proof of this assertion, for he makes a comic feature of using capitals, after the manner of the old editions of 'Aesop's Fables. But among the rank and file of our writers, notably in the daily press, there seems to have sprung up a confused use of capitals which is perplexing. Will you kindly enlighten me?

Edgar Allan Poe.

The New York Times Saturday Review of Books:

In an article on "The Truth About Edgar A. Poe," by Eugene L. Didier, in the March-April number of The Book Lover, Mr. Didier gives an exhaustive study of the strange, eventful life of America's most remarkable genius. The article is illustrated with rare portraits, &c., and is a vindication of Poe from the malignant aspersions of Griswold and other defamers. The South has always been proud of her wonderful poet, and here in Baltimore, where he reposes in the sleep of death, his memory is one of the city's most cherished traditions.

It may not be out of place to mention that the Poe Memorial Association, which was organized here in the Winter of 1898 for the purpose of erecting a statue to the poet, has never gone beyond its incipiency, the organizers being apparently satisfied with the election of officers, appointing of committees, and speechmaking.

The New York Times Saturday Review of Books:

Regarding Spenser's "Faery Queen": It may interest some of your readers to know that I have in my possession a copy of a "prose translation" of the first canto, "Holiness," written by Mrs. Peabody and published by E. R. Broaders, Boston, 1836. Mrs. Nathaniel Hawthorne, Mrs. Horace Mann, and Miss Elizabeth Peabody were the authors of the "Peabody Sisters" who established the school in 1835 and wrote among other things, on the title page: "The Faery Queen" was translated from Spenser's antique verse into modern prose by my mother, who discovered her sisters supply on Spenser's Faery Queen." The printed preface suggests that the remaining "Legends of Temperance, Chastity, Friendship, &c., are in manuscript, a source of delight to such young persons as have access to them. They will come forth at the call of the public." I am under the impression that they were never printed, however.

Wilson's Readers.

The New York Times Saturday Review of Books:

Permit me, as the strength of an thirty seasoned educator, to assert with very great confidence that the venerable author of "Wilson's Readers," by all means deserves to be ranked in the worthiest company of genuine authors the world ever knew. And this though his ninety long years had produced nothing but Wilson's Readers. They are worth literally their real weight in gold if examined in the light of not only their upon tens of millions of school books their intellectual inferiors, but also in the whatever light of a great deal of so-called fine literature.

I speak with personal reminiscence of a whole set of Wilson's Readers, bestowed on me for a juvenile Christmas gift in 1862. I never used them at school, but spontaneously "devoured" them again and again at home, thereby naturally acquiring a first-rate sound taste for the essentials of a well-graded, rationally developed popular instruction in the large general outlines of zoology, ornithology, botany, (mark me the popular, denoting our common rights in the natural creation,) besides an excellent preparation for standard good literature through the wisely selected miscellaneous variations from natural science. There was, moreover, in the very prints and initial spelling book a certain lively appeal to sensible idealism: utterly wanting, I find, in methodical pedagogy of advanced modern times.

Forasmuch, then, as my own schooling ran a subsequent course through what is nowadays the most sumptuous boys' school in Pennsylvania, through the most classical and substantial régime of Yale under Dr. Noah Porter; through a delightful biennium of French study and travel abroad, plus erratic opportunities between Quebec and the tropics thereafter, I beg roundly to maintain that the very nonexistence of these total studies, and they were good, though I be sought, was that early training by Wilson's Readers. I had a few other juvenile companion books of amusement, such as Sanford & Merton, "Shifting Winds," "Little Men," Schmid's "Easter Eggs," (among other fatherlandish treasures,) and "Cudjo's Cave; but for involuntary, comprehensive education pure and simple I feel peculiarly indebted to Wilson's Readers, edition of 1862.

If, as I can gladly believe, they have yielded similar permanent schooling to thousands of better men, there should be no possible question as to their author's large rights in the wide, wide world of letters.

Jean Baptiste Colbert.

The New York Times Saturday Review of Books:

My attention was attracted to a recent criticism of "A Rose of Normandy," by William E. A. Wilson, in which the writer was accused of vilifying Colbert, the Minister of Finance under Louis XIV. On reading the book the writer does not find this point at all well taken, as any student of French history knows Colbert, born of humble parentage, was for many years the assistant and worthy successor of the gifted Cardinal Mazarin, in a period when treachery and deceit were a fine art, and intrigue was everywhere prevalent among courtiers of every rank. It would seem strange, indeed, if a successor of two such cunning and unscrupulous characters as Richelieu and Mazarin did not follow the example and teachings set by his master.

There are degrees of wickedness and knavery, and for the first two great Cardinals mentioned we can feel some admiration, as their selfish knavery and duplicity were linked with a powerful ambition for the aggrandisement of their country and their King.

With Colbert we find, however, selfishness paramount. The genius of his predecessors had built up a fabric of kingly power and absolutism which he found existing on entering the duties of his office. His life work was that of maintaining this fabric rather than augmenting it. Just in so far as its maintenance contributed to his own advancement and advantage did he lend the aid of his supremely selfish, petty nature. It seems, therefore, with such a character in mind, impossible to vilify. In dealing with another man, to vilify him would mean to injure; to vilify Colbert would be to speak the truth.

Charlotte Mary Yonge.

By the unfortunate insertion of a "not" in the title of one of Miss Charlotte Yonge's latest books at the end of your review in your last issue, you have made Miss Yonge apparently go back on the whole trend of her literary and religious life. She was pre-eminently a supporter of the Anglo-Catholic school in the Church of England. The title should read, I think you will find, "Why I am a Catholic, and Not a Roman Catholic?"

Magazines Flexibly Bound.

In a paroxysm of joy a writer on art in a daily newspaper hails the apparition of a reproduced head by Botticelli on a magazine cover as symptomatic of better things than the crude and fanciful designs and gay decorative devices which publishers are wont to employ in enticing the unwary reader to view the riches within. Welcoming any change in improved artistic expression on the covers of our magazines, I have an inward feeling that the reading public would experience greater satisfaction from a flexible binding, such as The Atlantic Monthly affords. The Atlantic has a plain yellow cover, but the fingers are not tempted from thinking it. It is the one magazine of standing published and sent forth bound that need not open its mouth to cover, without revealing a stitch or loosening a fast. The magazine-proof magazine is a wonderful thing.

"John Phoenix."

The New York Times Saturday Review of Books:

The real name of "John Phoenix," who wrote "Phoenixiana," a specially bound copy of which has been presented to President Roosevelt, was George H. Derby. He was a Captain in the United States Topographical Engineers. He was born in Boston, Mass., in 1823; was graduated at West Point in 1842, seventh in his class; served in the Mexican War, and was severely wounded, receiving a brevet as First Lieutenant for gallant and meritorious conduct in the battle of Cerro Gordo; promoted to Captain in 1856 for fourteen years' continuous service. While on duty as lighthouse engineer he suffered a sunstroke, resulting in softening of the brain, and after eighteen months' suffering he died in a New York hospital, March 15, 1861, aged thirty-eight years. "Phoenixiana" was published by Appleton in 1856, and "Squibob Papers" by Carleton in 1859. John Phoenix (his nom de plume) was one of our first and best humorists, and much of the fun of Artemus Ward and his successors can be traced to him. "At one time editor of a San Diego newspaper," you say, Judge Ames, the editor of The San Diego Herald, left the paper in Derby's charge for a week during a hotly contested State election. Derby changed the politics of the paper and supported Waldo, the Whig candidate. He describes the fight on the Judge's return.

I knew a cousin of Derby in Paris in 1856-59. The Boston Derbys did not like Derby, for he made fun of their beloved city.

The New York Times Saturday Review of Books:

In a paragraph in THE NEW YORK TIMES SATURDAY REVIEW OF BOOKS mention is made of the presentation to President Roosevelt by the Chamber of Commerce of San Diego, Cal., of a copy of "Phoenixiana." You say "its author, John Phoenix, was a 'forty-niner,' at one time editor of a San Diego newspaper, and well known among the newspaper men of California."

John Phoenix was the pen name of Lieut. Derby of the regular army, who was years ago stationed in San Diego. The San Diego Herald was at that time published and printed by Judge Judson Ames, a Maine man, with perhaps the assistance of a boy or two. When the Judge went to San Francisco for a few weeks, as he occasionally did, any one of the army officers at the post who took a fancy to do so would temporarily edit the paper.

Ames was violently opposed to the Democratic Party, and a special joke upon one occasion in the absence of the regular editor was Derby's running up the Democratic ensign during the Judge's absence, and then wittily describing in his "Phoenixiana" the battle that occurred upon Judge Ames's return.

"John Phoenix" and "Squibob" were Lieut. Derby's two noms de plume.

I have this direct from another officer of the United States Army who was stationed at San Diego at the same time, and who was cognizant of all that I have related.

Miss Wilkins's Prize Workmanship.

The New York Times Saturday Review of Books:

In the May number of McClure's Magazine is a little sketch by Miss Wilkins entitled "An Alpine Drive," wherein is described a duel fought in the Kirkland grounds by a French workman and his family.

Now it remains a fact that a Frenchman rarely drinks red and white wine together, and white wine is not a probable beverage for a courageous of that locality, though it might be in Southern France. The twist of bread is improbable, but not impossible. "A ragout" of mutton might be cut into slices; but a "ragout" is nothing more nor less than a mutton stew, and it would certainly require skilful carving to get slices off the small pieces.

A few lines further on we learn that she who was "this," which sounds very luxurious for a poor family, as the "vin ordinaire" is a thick, dark wine, and leaves a dark stain on table linen. When our workman wishes to "treat" another, he invites him to take a "petit bleu."

I am wondering then why Miss Wilkins does not stick to her New England milieu.

Bret Harte's "Trent's Trust," Mr. Thorpe's "Spoils of Empire," and Wilson's "The Wars of Peace."

BRET HARTE'S "Trent's Trust," published this week, is the forty-second of the little volumes of his works that have appeared from time to time. The sixteen volumes of the Riverside Edition include all except the last five, and they will in time be added to it. It is years since, in prodigality or cruelty, he let Jack Hamlin die literally to slow music, but chapters of his life have appeared from time to time, and one may be found in this book, showing Jack as of old, at once elegant and brutally severe, convalescing on a lonely California ranch and teaching the dignitaries of a neighboring town to play poker with a cold deck, which he obligingly "ran in on them," thus giving tremendous interest to the game. Alas, the parson won the game by pure bluff, without so much as one little pair. Probably this is an allegory. Col. Starbottle is another person whose adventures might very well have outlasted another century. Who, having once made his acquaintance, has not wished to know more of that grandiloquent sinner? One's last glimpse of him in this book shows him sufficiently discomfited to be pitiable, but not beyond the possibility of recovery. "Trent's Trust," the first of the stories and the longest, has the air of having been originally intended for a little novel, and then curtailed, although it is brought to an ending quite satisfactory to the romantic. And this is the last! Happily one can re-read the other forty-one at will.

Mr. Francis Newton Thorpe's "The Spoils of Empire," a curious mixture of really good intrigue, misconception of that purely political institution, the Spanish Inquisition, and Aztec barbarities, contains two or three unintentionally amusing bits. For instance, when the young hero, while preparing to take Holy Orders, heard of an expedition to reinforce Cortes, he desired to join it, and "tossed his rubric into the corner," a serious thing to do, considering what a rubric is. But Juan had "an angelic face and cherubic limbs," being therefore even more remarkable than Sir Richard Calmady, and tossing rubrics was mere play to him. He came back from Mexico with a native Princess for a bride, but he was slightly embarrassed by her dowry of gold. Seven tons of it he openly placed in the custody of the Church, but three tons and a half she retained, and an honest bakeress took charge of it. This trifle of 7,000 pounds of gold was taken to her shop one night in the bread baskets gathered up after the day's market, and it was "a little bakeshop," too. Incidentally these tons of gold are whisked from hiding place to hiding place, sometimes by one person and sometimes by two, giving one the impression that a sixteenth century Spaniard shone even more brilliantly as a porter than as a soldier.

***

In the years to come, when men look back on "The Trust" and its novels and tracts as the connecting links between the finance literature and politics of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, they will wonder that the three stories in which Charles Dudley Warner gathered up all his knowledge of the world and uttered it were not more conspicuously successful in their day. Read they certainly were, but not for them the tales of hundreds of thousands of buyers and multiplied editions, yet what later novelist has uttered a deeper or higher word than theirs in regard to the effects, objective and subjective, of setting wealth above principle? Here, for instance, is Mr. A. F. Wilson's "The Wars of Peace," showing that of all whose lives are blighted by selfishness in business the greatest sufferer is not the half-starved laborer, not the impoverished or thwarted small capitalist risen from the ranks, but the gently bred and gently nurtured man, who begins by diplomacy and ends in falsehood unavailing to preserve him from being ground between the greed of his brutal associates and the hate of the ignorant whom he has oppressed. Mr. Wilson exhibits the truth as the last few years have shown it in the life of more than one of the money kings, and his financial and economical arguments rather gain than lose by being made parts of family quarrels, but almost every one of his cases can be paralleled from one or the other of Mr. Warner's stories. This is not to be taken as imputing any lack of originality to him or to his story. It includes business men of two generations, men bred in widely differing traditions and women of many temperaments, and it shows the trust playing the part in the family life of to-day that was played before the war by abolition in the North and State rights in the South.

Americanisms still occupy the attention of The Spectator's correspondence, but in the very same number which refers funny of the phrases thus named to Elizabethan English is a letter on the English spoken in Ireland, noting the Irish use of "gone abroad," "not to designate foreign parts, but merely next door." There is nothing peculiarly Irish about this. Cowper was not Irish, but he wrote "And when his next doth ride abroad," of John Gilpin, and "go abroad" still survives in New England villages as an equivalent of "go out of the house."

***

The course of Mr. Douglas Sladen's journeyings having led him to Sicily, he took Miss Katherine Prescott Wormeley's translation of "Speronera" thither "to see if Dumas meaned, from internal evidence, ever to have set foot on the island," but the good Alexandre's art was too much for him, and he contented himself with the Orphic saying that the book "gives a clear but inaccurate idea of Sicily as Pierre Loti's 'Madame Chrysanthème does of Japan.'" Also, he thinks that the book bears a close resemblance to the "Lettres de Sicile" stolen by some Frenchman from the letters of Brayden.

Poor Mr. Sladen has been the victim of an American book entitled "Eighty Good Times Out of Doors," a volume which describes certain open air games, and tells of certain pleasant things to be seen or done out of doors in certain places. It is all one to Mr. Sladen, and from a consultation with such a jury of American matrons as can be gathered in a Continental pension he emerged with the discovery that "Mardi Gras, Egg Rolling at the White House, Ducks and Drakes, Snow Forts, and Tobogganing" are almost the "only games that are at all of universal acceptance," and that Hab-Ebihan Al Verdo, Hornaway, My Aunt Dora's Rag Carpet, and Bangpops are not thus accepted. Hab-Ebihan sounds like a new kind of Turkish Delight.

Among the orders received by Messrs. Houghton, Mifflin & Co. for the limited edition of Montaigne which they are now making, one has come from Mexico and one from India. Apparently there are still scholars in that southern republic that had churches and libraries long before its younger sister of the North, and still there are princes whose love for books is akin to that of him by whose aid Max Muller accomplished the great work of his life.

***

One hears much about the little girl's love for her doll and about her belief that the doll is alive, but perhaps the most amazing indication of it appeared in a story written by a child and recently sent to a religious paper for publication. It ended thus: "And they lay there still and tranquil, for the Master, who said, 'Suffer little children to come unto Me,' had taken the soul of the little girl and the soul of the doll Sally to Himself." One hardly knows whether to laugh or to cry over this view of the scheme of salvation.

"Middle-Aged Love Stories."

Miss Daskam's little volume should bring joy to the heart of the spinster, for it seems that it is never too late for the boy god to find her out. Between sober, dark green covers, these seven short love stories are attractive enough for light reading. True, the reader finds his enthusiasm not quite so keen after having read the seventh as after the first. This is not the fault of the author, perhaps, but rather of the unfortunate present-day practice of bringing stories of such marked similarity so closely together.

In "The Philanthropist" Miss Daskam seems to have caught a bit of Mr. Stockton's delicious humor. Without suggesting imitation, the sweet seriousness of Miss Gould, which leads her to do so many attractively funny things, recalls some of the happy types of Mr. Stockton's minor heroines. The love episode in the "Valley of the Shadow" strikes one a little suddenly. For a middle aged widower Belden seemed to "have had it hard." "The Courting of Lady Jane," is graceful and pretty, "Julia the Apostate," delightful, and "Mrs. Dud's Sister" presents the picture of an amiable, gracious lady. In "A Reversion of Type," a tired assistant in the German Classes remembers the lover she left in the Vaterland. She sends for him after seven years—but somehow one does seem to consider her exactly middle aged. In "A Hope Deferred" Miss Daskam has struck her most pathetic note in the homesickness of the little Frenchman, and the sacrifice of the New England spinster.

All the stories are stamped with that quiet gayety that characterises all of this young author's works, but even as we read these romantic pages torn from the lives of elderly men and women, there arises before us the figure of Phillip, the inimitable, and of Dicky, the passionate lover, together with all those other countless little fellows whom we have met through Miss Daskam, and we sigh as we wonder if their creator has deserted them forever.

How to Keep Well.

What is described as "an explanation of modern methods of preventing disease" will be published in a few days by Doubleday, Page & Co. under the title "How to Keep Well," by Dr. Floyd M. Crandall. In this book the author endeavors to tell, as he says in his introduction:

How medicine has arisen from mysticism, supernaturalism, and superstition, and, having gradually emerged from the thralldom of astrology upon the one hand and theology on the other, now stands forth in the forepost rank of the sciences. Why it is worthy of acceptance rather than the crude systems of quackery and pseudo-science which one after another rise only to sink into obscurity. To set forth our knowledge regarding the prevention of disease and to show what advances have been made in recent years in our ability to prolong life and to prevent suffering, disease, and death.

He also describes the progress medicine has made these later years, and explains the methods of preventing disease which the non-professional may understand. There are chapters on heredity, infectious diseases, vaccination, modern surgery, the rearing of children, their diet, and so on.

On Old China.

N. Hudson Moore has written a book in which he describes the old wares in pottery and porcelain that were made in England. He illustrates his remarks by pictures of the variations, and aims to assist the would-be collector in choosing his specimens. He discourses in full on the Staffordshire wares. "The Old China Book," which, by the way, bears the imprint of Frederick A. Stokes Company, contains lists of the English and American views of each maker. Pictures are given of the choicest pieces taken from the best collections in the country. Mr. Moore also gives details of interest aside from the manufacture of "old china." There are 130 illustrations, and among them are two showing specimens recently sold at auction in this city: A platter in dark blue, made by Clews, in the series known as "Dr. Syntax," which brought $470, and a view called "New York from Brooklyn Heights," by Stevenson, which brought $290.

These are the four heiresses hunted by the Earl of Frothingham, on his American tour for a rich wife. How he fared with each of them you may read in the liveliest and brightest of the season's novels,

Some Kenyon's Resemblance to Shakespeare and Burns—A Volume on Charles Lamb—Prison Literature—Some New Books.

LONDON, April 25.—The Times is spending an immense amount of money in advertising its "competition," and the other papers speak of it with as much lightness as is consistent with a due regard for the interests of their advertising columns. Punch and The Outlook have parodied the advertisement in a very amusing way, and the public, or at all events that part of the public which does not mean to enter the competition, heartily wishes that The Times had not undertaken to rival the weekly puppet pageant, with their tempting competition schemes.

It has usually been understood that the function of a newspaper is to supply news and to influence public opinion. Certainly neither of these ends can be attained by offering prizes to people who will answer sixty more or less difficult questions. Nobody supposes that The Times was in need of any such method of extending its circulation, and the fact that the competition is merely a scheme for disposing of copies of the Encyclopaedia Britannica is manifest. The Times undertook to sell the Encyclopaedia at a much lower rate than it had previously been sold. This may or may not have been a good advertising scheme, but it certainly was not journalism. Now it is plain that The Times did not succeed in selling all the copies of the Encyclopaedia that it had bought, and therefore it decided to advertise a competition which no one could win without having the Encyclopaedia at his elbow. The first advertisement of the competition did not dwell on the indispensability of the Encyclopaedia, but the later advertisements and the circular explaining the nature of the competition in detail all make it clear that on entering the competition one must either buy or hire the Encyclopaedia.

If it is legitimate for a great newspaper to combine the selling of encyclopedias with its ordinary business, why draw the line at encyclopedias? Why should not The Times undertake to supply tobacco and cigars at a rate below that at which these articles are sold by tobacconists? A Times cigar at twopence, which should be equal to an ordinary sixpenny cigar, would have an immense sale, and would extensively advertise the paper. If by any chance The Times should find that it had more cigars and tobacco on its hands than it could dispose of it could then start a competition open to smokers of The Times tobacco and cigars only. Thus it could rid itself of surplus stock and enable people to gratify the taste for winning prizes. It would be difficult to find any real distinction between the sale by a newspaper of encyclopedias and the sale by the same newspaper of tobacco and cigars. Indeed, I greatly wish that The Times had gone into the tobacco business instead of the encyclopedia trade. I should then have been able to save a good deal in the cost of cigars, and should have been eligible to enter a Times competition as a smoker, whereas I cannot enter the present competition for lack of a copy of the Encyclopaedia Britannica.

Any other newspaper except The Times might have started a competition, and it would not have attracted very much notice. But that The Times should tout for purchasers for its encyclopedia and offer large prizes to winners in a competition, strikes the British public much as would an offer on the part of the Archbishop of Canterbury to do a song and dance "turn" at a music hall for the benefit of the Canterbury restoration fund.

A Scotch newspaper has discovered close resemblances between FitzGerald's "Omar Khayyam" and the writings of Burns and Shakespeare, and suggests, in perfect good faith, that possibly the Persian poet may have studied both the English and Scottish poets. If the critic had said that FitzGerald had read Burns and Shakespeare he would doubtless have been quite right, and the fact would have accounted for any resemblances between Burns and Shakespeare and "Omar Khayyam." But why should there not be such resemblances? Everything has been said at one time or another that can be said, and in the writings of every poet there must sometimes be passages which suggest the writings of other poets. I see that Prof. Phelps has discovered resemblances between Maeterlinck's "Monna Vanna" and Browning's "Luria." Very probably such resemblances exist, but that is no sufficient reason for supposing that Maeterlinck has ever read "Luria." There are people who have read it, and the probability is that they wish they had employed their time more profitably; but it is perfectly easy to account for the existence of "Monna Vanna" without adopting the theory that Maeterlinck ever read Browning's play.

Mr. Wells is engaged on a new romance in which, so it is said, a new sort of food enables men and animals who eat it to grow to enormous size. This does not seem altogether an attractive subject for a romance, but those who know Mr. Wells's writings will cherish no doubt as to his success in dealing with his new theme. Mr. Wells has a rare genius for making the impossible seem probable. Only once in his various romances has he failed in this respect. His "Sea Lady" was impossible from first to last, and it never succeeded for a moment in convincing its readers that mermaids in the depths of the sea read modern books dropped overboard from vessels, or that mermaids ever live the months out of water and constant themselves like ordinary English girls. But that was only one failure among half a dozen brilliant successes, and there is nothing so absolutely impossible in the idea of a food that promotes excessive and sudden growth that Mr. Wells may not succeed in making it seem extremely probable.

Mr. Bertram Dobell, in his new volume on Charles Lamb, has unearthed the fact that Lamb was once set in the stocks. What of it? We all know Lamb's failing. That he drank more than his head could stand is as familiar as the fact that his sister was insane, but why dwell upon either tragedy? If Lamb was really set in the stocks for drunkenness would it not have been better to ignore the fact? But Mr. Dobell evidently thinks that he has made a brilliant and important discovery. Perhaps there are other admirers of Lamb who will agree with him, but surely most of us will wish that Mr. Dobell had not dragged the incident of the stocks to light.

The popularity of prison literature continues. By prison literature I mean the descriptions of prison life written by eminent, or at least clever, criminals. If this sort of thing continues to be popular, by and by it will be the recognized thing for every criminal, male or female, to write his or her record of prison experiences. There must be those, aside from professional philanthropists of prison-reforming taste, who take a vast interest in learning how a prisoner eats, sleeps, and works. But is that the sort of interest which is healthful and useful? It would naturally be of value to criminals entering upon their career to know what would happen to them when the day of imprisonment should arrive, and what prisons an intelligent criminal should prefer to enter, but for the public at large the autobiography of criminals is not precisely the best variety of reading.

Mrs. Craigie's new novel, "The Vinegard," is to appear as a serial in The Pall Mall Magazine. Whether a serial story helps the sale of a magazine or does not help it, is a question upon which editors do not agree. Some of the leading London magazine will have nothing to do with serials, strictly so called, though they will accept a series of connected stories. Other editors believe that no well-regulated magazine can possibly be without its serial story. Both opinions are more or less correct. A serial that takes the fancy of the public will sell a magazine, and a serial that does not take the public's fancy will have no influence upon the sale of a magazine, unless it be to lessen its popularity. This is such an elementary truth that it seems odd that there can be an editor who does not perceive it. Nevertheless, the editors who have made up their minds that serial stories universally hurt the magazines in which they appear will cling to that belief, and those who believe in the indispensability of the serial will continue to publish serials which the public does not like, as well as those which it is sure to like. Probably Mrs. Craigie's serial will be of the latter class, for she is one of our most clever writers, and her books have unifgenly met with public favor.

Every one knows that the Anglo-Saxon tourist is not a favorite on the Continent. If there could be any doubt as to the reason of this, a book recently published, entitled "Anglican Innocents in Spain," would fully explain it. The book sets forth the characteristic Anglo-Saxon theory that whatever is not either English or American is necessarily bad. There are thousands of British tourists who hold that the mere fact that anything is not English is sufficient proof that it is wholly unworthy of toleration; and there are thousands of American tourists who hold that Europe is fifty years behind Chicago in everything, and never fail to acquaint the benighted European with that axiom. This sort of thing does not make either the English or the American tourist of the grosser sort popular in Europe. The book to which I just referred tells its readers how dirty and ignorant, and generally worthless, the Spaniards are; and probably the author would be surprised if any Spaniard should happen to read the book and should not like it. The author's defense would be that he found many things in Spain that were not English, and he would wonder that any one, even a Spaniard, should be so benighted as not to recognise that anything that is not English ought to be severely condemned.

Oberammergau and Its Play.

Books and magazines have, ever since the lecture of Stoddard some twenty years ago made us acquainted with the Passion Play, placed nearly all the elements of that subject within easy access. Another volume is now added to the list, ("Oberammergau in 1900: The Village, the People, the Passion Play," by Sarah Willard Hows. New York: The Abbey Press. 50 cents,) which possesses the advantages of being small in size and in price.

Besides giving a history of the play and a critical estimate of the way in which it was performed in 1900, the author deals sufficiently with the village which gave it birth and with the country round about; and the text is illustrated with several half-tone reproductions of familiar photographs. The volume is the result of an actual visit to the place where the impressions of the drama and of its dramatis personae are emphasized with a certain amount of historical and critical reading. And both text and pictures are worthy of a much better setting than they have received at the hands of the present publishers, although how far the poor thing offered is justified by the moderate price asked we are unable to say.

The book, however, has a certain merit value for just now there is talk in Vienna of sending the Passion Play to St. Louis to give performances there during the exhibition next year. Bryn now an agent of the exhibition is seeking to secure the consent of the Archbishop of Munich to the enterprise.

A Tale of Denmark.

THE WARD OF KING CANUTE. By Ottilie A. Liljencrantz. Illustrated by Tony Sarg. Margaret W. Kinney, Chicago; A. C. McClurg & Co.

A historical novel and a love story of great merit and quite unusual interest is "The Ward of King Canute," by Ottilie A. Liljencrantz, author of "The Thrall of Leif the Lucky." The plot is laid in the troublous time of the invasion of England by the Danes under Canute, and the story opens on the eve of one of the fiercest battles between the invaders and the Anglos under Edmund Ironsides.

Norman Lootwinsson, friend of Edric Jast of Mercia, who coveted the castle and lands of Avalcomb, had taken the place by surprise and slain the Danish Lord Frodasson, who owned it by right of might—as most castles were held at that period—and his young son, Fridtjof. Then he had sought to marry by force thedead Frode's only other child, Randalin, but she, disguised in her brother's clothes, had made her escape, and in this guise is introduced to the reader.

She journeys to the camp of Canute to demand justice, but the sights she sees there decides her to keep her sex a secret, and she becomes Canute's page and as such goes into battle with him, saves his life and is wounded. She is found lying bleeding and senseless by one of the English chiefs, Egbert of Ivardale, who in pity for the supposed boy's plight takes her under his protection and makes her his constant companion. Randalin falls in love with him, but he never suspects that she is not a boy until in altered circumstances he sees her in her woman's garb at the Court of the King, who has made her his ward.

The compromise by which Edmund and Canute agreed to divide the kingdom with the understanding that at the death of the one the other was to become sole ruler is arranged (by the author) during a duel for this supremacy between the two monarchs in presence of both armies. Canute is made to appear as a man of high moral aspirations whose resolution and will to do justice to Anglo and Dane alike are maintained in face of the savage discontent of the Danes, who could understand no law subversive of the old law of war that gave to the conqueror the right to despoil the conquered.

At a great banquet he summarily arrests Hilfo after the latter had boastingly avowed that he poisoned Edmund, which crime had been previously (though mistakenly according to the author) attributed to Canute. At the same time Randalin has the satisfaction of seeing the murder of her father and brother avenged by the execution of Norman Lootwinsson. In the end she becomes the bride of Egbert, who has been made Marshal of the Kingdom.

The illustrations, of which there are six, are well worthy of the story. They have been reproduced by the three-color process from oil paintings by Mr. and Mrs. Kinney, who have been at much pains to render details of costume and armor historically accurate.

Down in Maine.

The veteran skippers and Captains of the remote coast village of Killick Cove who assembled nightly to gossip around the stove in Cap'n Simeon Roundturn's store had a fine contempt for book learning. As Cap'n Job Gaskett "allowed," and Cap'n Roundturn agreed, "there's dozens and dozens here to this cove that never would once know their own names of they see 'em writ on a barn door in big overgrowed letters five foot high." But they had an abiding faith in their own "hoss sense" and that of the community generally.

Cap'n Isaac Windseye employed this "hoss sense" to convince his hearers that the theory that the world was round was nothing less than "rubbidge." Skipper Job Gaskett, though bitterly opposed to Cap'n Windseye politically, shared his opinion that the world undoubtedly was flat, his conclusions being principally based upon the fact that a flat chart was used in navigation without apparent difficulty.

Skipper Job, moreover, had been directing his attention to the moon and entertained advanced ideas concerning that luminary.

"I've sot night after night of late and studied up the moon in good shape. I'm tellin' of ye flat-footed she ain't inhabited, not by a jugful, she ain't. But jest for the argyment like we'll take and supposen she is and that there's any shoes and slathers o' folks livin' onto her, we'll say. This is when she's real good and full, mind you. Now, what makes out to take my tall down is just this 'ere: How in the name o' Sam Hyde can all them same crowd o' folks stick onto her by the time she's all shrunk up to her last quarter, you?

This, too, is an argument so staggering that the combined "hoss sense" upon the egg boxes and meal sacks and the chairs sacred to the big guns of the Cove does not venture to question it.

And so those of the group who by virtue of position and experience are qualified to speak, philosophize and interpose their quaint ideas with reminiscences and anecdotes à l'appui, some of which are humorous and some pathetic. All, of course, are stories of the sea or of the hardy fisherfolk, and well worth reading.

DARREL

By IRVING BACHELLER

Author of "Eben Holden"

THE BROOKLYN DAILY EAGLE says—

"In color and character the touch is always fine, natural and impressive. Mr. Bacheller is a thorough workman, who conceives his effects, even the most illusive, with steadfastness and conviction. What is particularly calculated to give to this book a popularity equal to that of its predecessor is the manly morality which it preaches in a guise too attractive to appear didactic. It is no mere phrase to say that there is not a dull page in the book."

NEW YORK HERALD says—

"In the portrayal of such types, drawn distinctly from American life, Mr. Irving Bacheller stands perhaps without a rival." Postpaid, $1.50.

Gautier's Verse and Criticism.

THE WORKS OF THEOPHILE GAUTIER. Translated and edited by Prof. E. C. de Sumichrast of Harvard University. Poems translated by Agnes Lee. Vol. XXIII. "Art and Criticism" and "The Magic Hat," with introduction by the editor. Vol. XXIV. "Bernardo and Camoëns and Other Poems." Edition limited to 1,000 numbered and registered sets. Published for subscribers only. New York: George D. Sproul.

Two more volumes of Prof. de Sumichrast's translation of "The Works of Théophile Gautier" have come to hand. The bookish qualities of this edition have already been dwelt upon in these columns, as has also the ability of the Harvard professor as a translator. With the volumes now before us, XXIII. and XXIV., the edition closes. It is beside the point to say that much of Théophile Gautier's work should not—for certain ethical reasons and out of regard to the ubiquitous "young person"—have been put into English. The thing is now done, and Prof. de Sumichrast is to be congratulated, from at least a literary point of view, in the way he has performed his task. Translating is a department of literature which has never received its due amount of critical attention, owing, perhaps, to those commercial exigencies which have very often been the cause of translations and which have tended to belittle if not to disgrace the genuine art of the genuine translator.

Prof. de Sumichrast evidently approached his work from the point of view of an artist who would produce not a mere copy, not a mere reproduction, but an illusion of the reality to be comprehended through a foreign medium. And the greatest praise that we can give him on the completion of his work is that—and we say this after careful reflection—a reader of Théophile Gautier, as he has presented the author, might easily imagine that a new writer in the English language was thereby revealed, provided, of course, the paradox could be discovered that the said reader had never heard of Théophile Gautier or of the language in which he wrote.

Volume XXIII., which concerns Théophile Gautier's articles on "Art and Criticism," notably the one on "Baudelaire," is introduced as usual with a brief exposition of the material translated, and with a few notes as to the circumstances in which it was written. The frontispiece is a photogravure on Japan vellum of J. Rixens's painting "Don Juan in Hades."

The final volume of the edition includes Gautier's poems introduced with rather an extensive notice of the part the French author played in this department of literature. In an attempt to touch the English ears as well as the English mind with Gautier's verse the editor has called to his assistance Agnes Lee, who has given English reproductions in metre. We think this is a mistake, and Prof. de Sumichrast, in his introduction, has given us, unconsciously though it may be, a sufficient basis for this opinion:

> It is impossible to preserve that peculiar warmth of color, that flushing of hue which charms in the original, and the loss of which while it may not be noted by the reader unacquainted with the language in which the original is written, nevertheless so far disfigures the translation and makes it perforce unfaithful.

The greatest obstacle with which translators into English have to contend is the poverty in our language of rhyming words which possess various phases of harmony. A love poem in Spanish, for example, which may dwell again and again upon a hackneyed sentiment, is beautiful through the music that it produces upon the ear. A reproduction of such a poem in English usually becomes mere doggerel through the unpoetical nature of the English equivalents. There is a good deal of the Spanish in Gautier's verse, and the theme is usually subordinate to the treatment. Hence, the verses which Agnes Lee has given us, although very nearly literally perfect, word for word, and showing considerable ingenuity in bringing French sentiment into the English straitjacket, reveals very little of the spirit and atmosphere of the original. More would have been preserved, we think, had Prof. de Sumichrast been content to give us prose renderings, making the style of his diction conform as nearly as possible to Gautier's idea. That he could have done this there is not the slightest doubt, for his translation of "Albertus" and "The Comedy of Death" show his wonderful capacity to reproduce French poetic sentiment through dignified and beautiful English prose.

We can only add that if there seemed in the mind of certain persons a real need for an English translation of the works of Théophile Gautier, it is fortunate that the task has fallen to the hands of a man like Prof. de Sumichrast, who, besides having produced a work of reflected as well as of original intrinsic literary value, has done more than any one whom we know has done—unless it be Baudelaire in his fragmentary translation of De Quincey—to define and to illustrate the translator's art in a manner which makes its department of literature secure and respected.

"Tommy Wideawake."

Compliments have consisted in taking the pleasure out of the reading of many a good book, and so when his publishers in an effort to awaken interest in Mr. Bashford's "Tommy Wideawake" compared the little volumes of Kenneth Grahame's glowing recollections of childlife they at once set a standard high indeed for poor Tommy to reach. And Tommy himself was decidedly indifferent to everything but the sweetness of life and the zest of living.

When his father went off to India, where he was killed in the war, the shaping of Tommy's future falls to the lot of four old friends of the late Colonel, a doctor to whom the Colonel looked for the scientific guidance of his son; a poet, who was to teach him the poetry of life and nature; a vicar, who would lead him to God and his mercy, and a philosopher, who would teach him to meet life with easy grace. Under such tutelage was he to pass through the years which would lead him to manhood and the shouldering of the burdens of a country squire.

And Tommy in the hands of his masters grows into noble manhood, but not before he had brought the doctor out of dry science into the world of active athletics, the poet away from idle rhapsodies addressed to the goddess of nature into the garden of love, the vicar nearer to his own God, and the philosopher better able than ever to meet the exigencies of life. Mr. Bashford has a pleasant, easy style of writing. Tommy, in spite of his innate goodness, is a boy, with all of a boy's wild nature. He tastes of folly, but he learns to recognize vice even in the guise of pleasure. And in the end, Mr. Bashford says:

> For if a boy's will be indeed the wind's will, let it be that of the wind on the heath, which the zygates breathe. And if the thoughts of youth be long, long thoughts, let them be born of earth, and air, and sun.
> And his faith, when of a sudden he shall find that there is God in all these things, shall be so deep that not all the criticism of all the schools shall be able to root it out of his heart.
> And the moral, if you must needs hammer one out, would be this, that soundness is more to be desired than scholarship, and that the heart of boyhood is, by nature, nearer to God than that of later life.
>

Studies in Character.

THE JOYOUS HEART. By Viola Rosebero. 12mo. Pp. 325. New York: McClure, Phillips & Co.

After one has taken his courage in his hands and manfully pierced, so to speak, the awful green wrappings of "The Joyous Heart," he may find it in his own heart to be glad of his hardihood, but it must be confessed that the vivid tone of the book's cover, surmounted, as it is, with a decorative medallion set with a nosegay of red, yellow, and blue blossoms, strikes terror to the faint-hearted.

Well along toward the middle of the volume, however, when the reflection of its cover has been somewhat dimmed, the story of "The Joyous Heart" takes on a warmer interest. Primarily, it is a study in temperaments, and the author has shown considerable skill in the handling of her characters. Vella Carruthers, the heroine, is a creature of indomitable buoyancy. Her sunny spirit refuses to be clouded even by the double tragedy which left her an orphan at a tender age. Hers is a nature born to enjoy much and to suffer much, but never, even while drinking deepest of the cup of sorrow, did Vella's splendid joy of life desert her.

Miss Rosebero has brought out the varying shades of her heroine's character excellently. It can scarcely be said that she has been equally happy in all her delineations, however. Her minor characters have a virility or sweetness, according to the natures they represent, but one has a sneaking feeling that in Elmore Osborne she intended to draw a portrait far more winning in its petulance than was the result. The horror of his death should have softened the memory of his shortcomings, and such, one feels, was Miss Rosebero's intention, but the hard-hearted reader remains obdurate and still maintains that he was only too evidently one who trod in the mud with his head in the clouds.

One easily reads Miss Rosebero's purpose to lay bare the human heart, and if in places she has not attained her aim, judgment should be lenient in proportion to the greatness of her endeavor. There are passages which grow wearisome owing to the intricacies of detail with which she has freighted them. While one would not dare to say that she has frequently lost herself in the labyrinth of her own verbiage, at least the reader may frankly admit having been at times tangled in an attempt to follow her. Fanny Osborne's studied schemes and intricate game for small stakes are puzzling. Truly, one expected little from Fanny, yet there is something very flimsy about a character that was obviously meant to be far more complex.

It is interesting to note Miss Rosebero's unvoiced belief that in the eyes lie the secrets of the soul, and it is there she has placed the key to the natures of each of her characters. Vella's blue eyes dance, and when she laughs they close slantingly; Fanny's are blue, too, but opaque and inscrutable, (which is why one feels aggrieved at seeing through Fanny so easily;) Andy's are of still another shade of blue, but frank, wide, and honest, while Elmore's chameleon orbs, at least on one occasion when he was very angry, rise to almost as impressionistic heights as the book's cover, for we are solemnly assured that "red spots (shone) in the depth of his yellow eyes."

In spite, however, of this too evident display of feeling on Elmore's part, the book is, for the most part, neat and sober and well worth reading. The incidents take place during the time of the civil war, but the story is not of the war itself. The echo of battle does not roar in its pages unless one might call battles those fierce flashes of love and hate, grave passions pitted against great passions, jealousies and all the other mad joys and sorrows of life. Of these there are indeed many fought and lost and won before Vella turns her face to the wall after her last great defeat, and, like her mother before her, dies with the joy of life still hot in her veins.

HARPER'S BOOK NEWS

LADY ROSE'S DAUGHTER.

In most successful novels some one thing may be found to which the success may be attributed—a new plot, an unusual sort of humor or the introduction of some popular historical figure as one of the characters. In "Lady Rose's Daughter" it is difficult to fasten upon any one point which has led to its remarkable success, for the reason that it embodies almost every characteristic which could make a book talked about. Its heroine is one of the most attractive women in all fiction. Its setting is in the great world of affairs in which every one is interested. It is a love story and it is written with such distinction of style, with such a thorough mastery of the novelist's art, that without reserve it may be classed as an addition to English literature.

It is not only a novel for the moment, but one which will live.

MARJORIE.
(Imprint of R. H. Russell.)

The great charm in the romantic novels of Mr. Justin Huntly McCarthy is that the author has the rare faculty of being able to create a true, romantic atmosphere. This quality accounts largely for the success of his play "If I Were King," and even more so for the success of his new novel, "Marjorie." It is a love story with a most dramatic setting—a story that is dominated by the personality of its beautiful heroine.

THE SUBSTITUTE.

In direct contrast to Mr. McCarthy's novel comes "The Substitute," a new story by Will N. Harben. Mr. Harben's story is peculiarly American, and it deals with a type of people known to most of us only through his books. They are a simple, easy-going people of Northern Georgia—a people who lead commonplace lives, yet lives as full of pathos and humor as those of Miss Wilkins's New England folk. Mr. Harben has revealed a new field in our literature, and as an interpreter of this simple life he is unexcelled.

IN THE GARDEN OF CHARITY.

Basil King's new book, In the Garden of Charity, is, like Mrs. Ward's novel, a book which is distinguished from the average popular story by its decided literary quality. It is a book which revives one's confidence in American writers. A book which in itself is a notably beautiful and poetic piece of work, and one which places Mr. King in the front rank of our living American writers.

THE PUBLISHERS

Plans of Some of Them—Forthcoming New Books.

AN UNILLUSTRATED Library Edition of the historical novels of G. P. R. James, in twenty-five volumes, is about to be published by E. P. Dutton & Co. The set will include many novels which have long been out of print and others still which are only to be met with in America in cheap, poorly made, pirated editions.

G. P. Putnam's Sons promise a new illustrated edition of Bayard Taylor's "Story of Kennett."

"An Ivory Trader in North Kenia," by A. Arkell-Hardwick, is the title of a volume describing from a scientific and commercial, as well as from a romantic, point of view the adventures and profession of an elephant hunter. The work, which will be fully illustrated, will appear through the press of Longmans, Green & Co.

Mr. Ripley Hitchcock, who for several years was literary adviser to D. Appleton & Co., has become associated with A. S. Barnes & Co. as Vice President of the concern, with the active office of literary adviser. Mr. Hitchcock, during his long connection with D. Appleton & Co., made several notable selections, particularly among authors who had not then "arrived," at least in America—Gilbert Parker, Stephen Crane, Felix Gras, Emerson Hough, Ellen Thorneycroft Fowler, Stewart Edward White, and Edward Noyes Westcott, author of "David Harum."

G. P. Dutton & Co. are publishing this week "State Experiments in Australia and New Zealand," by William Pember Reeves, author of "The Long White Cloud." The work, which is in two volumes, will be found a notable addition to the literature of politics, economics, and sociology, for the new federation in the Pacific is the land of political experiments par excellence.

G. P. Putnam's Sons are preparing a new edition of "Old Court Life in France," by Frances Elliot, which was first published in two volumes in 1872. The new edition will include several additional and notable illustrations.

Longmans, Green & Co. are about to issue a supplementary chapter, No. XLIX., to Volume III., "The Commonwealth and Protectorate," by Samuel Rawson Gardiner, edited by C. H. Firth.

The Macmillan Company is publishing this week "The Kempton-Wace Letters," which, as has already been said, tell the story of two men and a woman. Altogether the letters constitute a development of the function and significance of love. Dane Kempton is a poet. He writes from England to Herbert Wace, an instructor in economics at a Western university. Kempton believes that love is life, while the other maintains that it is a convention. The prologue of the book consists in a series of love letters in which is developed the third side of the question—the woman's.

"The Land of the Boxers; or, China Under the Allies," by Capt. Gordon Casserly of the Indian Army, will shortly come from the press of Longmans, Green & Co. The author relates, among other things, what the American forces have done in China and the relations there of the other powers.

"The True Abraham Lincoln," by William Eleroy Curtis, is the latest volume in the True Biographies, published this week by the J. B. Lippincott Company. Mr. Curtis is well known as a correspondent and writer upon contemporary historical and political affairs. Following the plan of his "True Thomas Jefferson," Mr. Curtis treats Lincoln in his various activities in as many chapters. He has been engaged on the book for over two years. The volume contains a large number of illustrations, personal portraits, and fac similes, as well as much anecdote.

"Cecilia Gonzaga," by R. C. Trevelyan, author of "Polyphemus" and other poems, will be brought out in about a fortnight by Longmans, Green & Co. This is a play of the Greek type, although the scene is laid at Mantua in 1450.

Charles Scribner's Sons will publish May 16: "Letters of a Diplomat's Wife," by Mme. Mary Ring Waddington, which was postponed on account of the arrangements pending for a large English edition to be issued by Smith, Elder & Co. of London; Prof. John E. McFadyen's "Old Testament Criticism and the Christian Church," "The Spirit in Man: Sermons and Selections," a volume of hitherto unpublished writings by Horace Bushnell; "Our Government—National and Local," by Profs. James A. James of Northwestern University and Albert H. Sanford of Stevens Point (Wis.) Normal School.

"The Triumph," the novel by Arthur Stanwood Pier, which has been running serially in McClure's Magazine, is announced for publication in a few days by McClure, Phillips & Co. This is the story of a physician's victory over himself; a victory which wins him eventually the love of which he thinks this same victory has robbed him. The scene is laid in the western part of Pennsylvania, amid the oil-fields.

The "Life and Letters of Brooke Foss Westcott," sometime Lord Bishop of Durham, a two-volume work by Arthur Westcott, has just been brought out in this country by the Macmillan Company. Mr. Westcott was distinguished for wide and deep learning, for his studious nature, and for his broad charitableness. Some years ago he was asked to settle a claim in the coal mines, which he did to the satisfaction of the miners and the owners of the coal-beds. Although 10 per cent. of the wages was deducted, he was cheered by thousands of workmen. The editor of the present work is Mr. Westcott's son. He has provided a bibliography of his father's writings, which occupies seven pages.

"Limanora: The Island of Progress," being a sequel to "Riallaro: The Archipelago of Exiles," is a new story by Godfrey Sweven, which will be brought out this Spring by G. P. Putnam's Sons. Like the former book, "Limanora" is said to be both a satire and an allegory. In "Rialtaro" the author tells how the central island in a South Pacific Archipelago got rid of those of its inhabitants who were criminals and morally diseased by planting them out on the surrounding islands, each type on a separate island. The narrative gives a picture of the life of these various islands. In the forthcoming book the author is said to describe the scientific advance of the community left on the central island.

"American Railway Transportation," by Prof. Emory R. Johnson, will be the next volume in D. Appleton & Co.'s Business Series of illustrated 12mo volumes, of which "Trust Finance," by Dr. E. S. Meade, and "The Work of Wall Street," by Sereno S. Pratt, were the first two. This subject has been a special source of study to Prof. Johnson, and he is known as one of our best authorities on it. While it is intended to afford instruction, the book is said to be entertaining. It will probably appear in June.

"A Daughter of the States" is a new novel by Max Pemberton, author of "The Garden of Swords," "The Gold Wolf," and other books. The story opens in mid-ocean, and much of the action takes place upon the sea. It closes in England. "A Daughter of the States" is in a vessel bound for England. The boat strikes another and goes down. The "daughter" is saved by a vessel carrying munitions of war to Venezuela, which also rescues the hero. They come near Martinique during the eruption of Mont Pelée, and are pursued by a Venezuelan gunboat. The book is in preparation for early Fall publication by Dodd, Mead & Co. It will be illustrated.

Harper & Brothers will publish May 19: "The Love of Monsieur," by George Gibbs; William Dean Howells's "Questionable Shapes," "Perverted Proverbs," by Col. D. Streamer, with the imprint of R. H. Russell, and "Mice and Men" and "The Sultan of Sulu," also with the imprint of R. H. Russell.

A poem by John H. Finley, Ph. D., LL. D., of Princeton University, who has just been unanimously elected President of the College of the City of New York, appears in the current number of The Lamp.

G. P. Putnam's Sons are issuing this week "Echoes from Erin and Other Poems," by William Westcott Fink; "Puerto Rican and Other Impressions," a volume of lyrics by William James, with illustrations by Spencer Baird Nichols; "Florida Fancies," by Frederick R. Swift, with drawings by Albert E. Smith, and "Psychology and Common Life," by Prof. Frank S. Hoffman, author of "The Sphere of Science," &c. This book is, as the subtitle indicates, "a survey of the present results of psychical research, with special reference to their bearings upon the interests of every day life."

"Bookbinders and Their Craft," by Miss S. T. Prideaux, which is published in this country by Charles Scribner's Sons in a limited edition of 500 copies, is shortly to be brought out in London by Zaehsdorf.

"Trapper Jim," the new book by Edwyn Sandys, author of "Upland Game Birds" and other books of nature, will be issued by the Macmillan Company on May 20. The volume will be profusely illustrated, and, as has already been stated in these columns, is about a young boy who spends his vacation in the country. Here he learns much in the way of fishing, shooting, swimming, drawing, and everything else a growing boy is interested in.

"The Anglo-Saxon Century and the Unification of the English-Speaking People," the new book by John R. Dos Passos of the New York bar, author of "Stock Brokers and Stock Exchange," "Commercial Trusts," &c., will be brought out June 1 by G. P. Putnam's Sons. As the title of the book indicates, the author advocates the union of the Anglo-Saxon race. In his introduction he says that the only real obstacle to a possible entente between this allied race may arise from the situation in Canada, and he urges that the Dominion should incorporate herself with the United States.

"David Hume and His Influence in Philosophy and Theology" will be the next volume in the series of "The World's Epoch Makers," published by Charles Scribner's Sons. This work is by James Orr, M. A., D. D., Professor of Apologetics and Systematic Theology in the United Free Church College, Glasgow.

The title of Miss Gwendolen Overton's new novel has been finally decided upon as "Anne Carmel." It will be published very shortly by the Macmillan Company.

"The South American Republics," in two parts, will be published May 25 in the Story of the Nations Series, by G. P. Putnam's Sons. It is by Thomas C. Dawson, Secretary of the United States Legation to Brazil. Part I. will include Argentina, Paraguay, Uruguay, and Brazil.

Appletons' Annual.

An authoritative register of the important events of the year 1902 in the new volume of Appletons' Annual Encyclopedia, a handsome octavo printed in double columns, crystallizing all the latest and most exact available information. Every country in the world is treated in its order; all the notable events that have taken place in each are given at length, as well as all manner of statistical details, such as imports and exports, financial condition, and important legislation passed or deliberated upon in the last twelve months. Each separate State of the Union has an article; so has every province of Canada, and other dependencies of great powers that have been prominent during the year are specially written about.

The article on our foreign relations, for instance, tells in its four pages the whole story of the Mexico Pious Fund, the Hay-Pauncefote treaty relating to the Panama Canal, the Russian sealing dispute, the Newfoundland treaty, and the Rosehill expedition to Marcus Island. Minister Bowen's good offices for President Castro are told in the six-page article on Venezuela, almost the whole of which is occupied with a recital of the various claims against that State and with the Anglo-German blockade. The article on the United States Supreme Court tells of the appointment of Oliver Wendell Holmes to succeed Justice Horace Gray, and gives a precis of the more important of the 309 cases considered by the court in 1902. The best known of these were: The deserter from the Russian warship Varing must be surrendered to his Government, though he had applied for naturalization here; the bankruptcy law of 1898 held to be constitutional, and the Oberlin M. Carter habeas corpus proceeding. The chapters relating to Governmental affairs in this country leave nothing to be desired.

The great disasters of the year are given under earthquakes and volcanic eruptions; the story of the destruction of Martinique is here complete, with photographs of ruined houses and public buildings. "China" tells of the Manchurian treaty, the evacuation of Tien-Tsin, the new commercial treaty, insurrectionary disturbances, &c. The record of the gifts and bequests of 1902 in the United States for educational, philanthropic, and religious objects covers 11 pages; no notice is taken of any gift of less than $5,000 nor of any Government appropriation nor of regular contributions of religious bodies, yet the known value here enumerated exceeds $64,000,000. This article is peculiar to the Appletons' Cyclopaedia, and from its advance pages was published in THE NEW YORK TIMES on Jan. 11, 1902. Under the heading "New York City" all the more important city officials are named; there is an extended notice of the financial operations of the municipality, and a record of the various sums appropriated by the Board of Estimate and Apportionment. There is a full-page picture of the new wing of the Metropolitan Museum of Art, with a short description; the rapid transit plans and the new tunnels are described at length; so, too, are the Carnegie Library plans and the Police Department under Partridge and Greene. All the other city affairs are gone into in the same way.

The article on medicine and the advances made in that science during 1902 includes the history of the mosquito diseases, such as the fight against yellow fever in Havanna, and the investigation of malarial fevers by the Surgeon General of the Army. Other portions of this article describe the International Congress on Consumption, held in Berlin; the reports on antitoxin for typhoid, rheumatism, and the plague are found here, as well as the description of the sleeping sickness and the controversy as to the value of alcohol as food. Last, but not least of the subheads, is the story of Dr. Lorenz, with a two-column account of the operations on crippled children, performed by him and called by his name.

The Financial Review of 1902 is a specially important article, with subheads on money, stocks, crops, foreign exchange, &c. Under the first of these is detailed the effort of Secretary Gage and his successor, Secretary Shaw, to ease the money market; also the New York Clearing House bank report for the last three years. There is a description of the South Carolina Interstate and West Indian Exposition, accompanied by a colored map of the fair grounds, two full-page engravings of various buildings, and some illustrations in the text.

Important special articles are also these on aerial navigation, illustrated; the Bureau of American Republics, with a portrait of the Superintendent, W. W. Rockhill; the new Carnegie Institute, recently established with an endowment of $10,000,000, a record of its aims, and a portrait of its founder. Then there is the record of the Coffee Conference in this city, held last October, by Pan-America; an article on the forthcoming Louisiana Purchase Exposition, just dedicated by President Roosevelt and ex-President Cleveland; one on the Pacific cable and Pacific commerce; one on the great Nile dam at Assouan, another on submarines, and one on wireless telegraphy. One of the most important of all the articles is the one giving the necrology of the year. There are fifty pages of America's dead and forty of foreign names, very many accompanied by illustrations. An excellent index embraces the years 1900, 1901, and 1902.

QUERIES.

"E. E." Flatbush, N. Y.: "In which of Robert Browning's poems occurs the line: 'And violets were born,' rhyming with 'morn' in the preceding line?"

In the prologue to "The Two Poets of Croisic," 1878:

Violets were born!

"A. L. B." Stewartsville, N. J.: "Please let me know through Queries the name of the picture by Millet on which Edwin Markham's poem, 'The Man With the Hoe,' is written."

"L'Angelus."

E. C. MAXWELL, 2,016 Bellevue Street, Philadelphia, Penn.: "I should like some particulars of the lives and poems of Eric Mackay and of Wilfrid Scawen Blunt. What is their standing as poets?"

Eric Mackay, son of Dr. Charles Mackay, was born in London Jan. 23, 1851, and died June 3, 1898. He was educated in Scotland, and later passed a number of years in Italy. His best-known work is the popular "Love Letters of a Violinist," 1885. Wilfrid Scawen Blunt was born in Sussex, England, Aug. 17, 1840. From 1859 to 1869 he was in the diplomatic service. Later he spent much time in the East. He favored the cause of Arabi Pasha, and is "an ardent advocate of justice to Ireland." His publications include several volumes of poetry, among them being "The Love Sonnets of Proteus," 1881, which is a notable contribution to Victorian verse. This work is published by Charles Scribner's Sons at $2, at which price they issue his "New Pilgrimage" and "In Vinculis." His "Satan Absolved" is published by John Lane at $1.25.

"A. W. E." 617 Lincoln Building, Union Square, New York City: "Who is the author of 'A Dotted Crescent'? Please give me any particulars regarding the author, if known."

"R. E." New York City: "Can you tell me who is the publisher of Good Literature?"

JOHN ALEXANDER, New York City: "Please give me the name of the work by Dante in which Francesca da Rimini is the heroine."

The tale of Francesca forms the close of Dante's "Inferno."

F. HAWKINS, Hartford, Conn.: "Who is the author of the old saying, 'With all her faults, this is my country still'?"

Charles Churchill, (1731-64,) author of "The Rosciad," 1761, &c. Churchill was a poor London curate, who eked out his meagre salary by teaching until he made a success with "The Rosciad," a satire on contemporary actors, and during the brief residue of his life abandoned himself to literature and dissipation. He died in Boulogne in 1764, publishing in the year of his death "The Farewell," an anonymous poem in which occurred these lines:

"In freedom what one will

THOMAS L. DENTON, New Rochelle, N. Y.: "Please inform me where I can buy the book, 'A Brief Description of New York in 1670,' by Daniel Denton?"

The Burrows Brothers Company of Cleveland, Ohio, recently reprinted this work at $2, but the edition, which was limited to 250 copies, has been exhausted. A copy can probably be obtained from any large bookseller.

MRS. A. P. FIELDING, 20 East Seventy-eighth Street, New York City: "Is Marie Corelli a married woman?"

No.

"W. I. G." 241 Dean Street, Brooklyn, N. Y.: "Is there a weekly or monthly paper published in New York, called The Chief, which is devoted to the interests of things pertaining to the Fire Department?"

The Chief is a weekly journal, published in this city at $2.50 a year.

"A. L. H." Princeton, N. J.: "Where can I get Chatterton's poems? Please give me the leading incidents of his life."

"Thomas Chatterton was born at Bristol, England, Nov. 20, 1752. He was educated in Bristol, and his first poems were published in Farley's Bristol Journal in 1768 and 1769. From 1767 to 1770 he produced a mass of poetry, the most noticeable portions of which were the pseudo-archaic "Rowley Poems," which were collected by Thomas Tyrwhitt in 1777. He was apprenticed to a Bristol attorney in July, 1767, but a boyish freak resulted in his leaving for London April 24, 1770, and beginning life there as a literary adventurer on a capital of about 6d. He found it impossible to live by literature, and on the evening of Aug. 24, 1770, he retired to his garret in Brooke Street, Holborn, locked himself in, tore up all his manuscripts, and poisoned himself with arsenic. His poems can be had from Houghton, Mifflin & Co. in the volume for $1.50; from the Macmillan Company in two volumes for the same sum. Prof. Skeat's edition of the poems (1871) does not seem to be in print in this country.

G. W. CRUVER, Brooklyn, N. Y.: "Kindly inform me if you know of any book entitled 'Wen at Last'?"

MISS EMMA C. ALDEN, 46 Sterling Lane, New Rochelle, N. Y.: "I think all are who I was once told 'who reads an American novel, and when it was said (or written)'"

This is a paraphrase of an inquotation of Sydney Smith's famous query, improvised by him in a letter of Stephen P. Blackpool, Esq., of the United States, published in The Edinburgh Review, January, 1820, and included in his collected essays. Smith ridiculed our early literature, arts, and sciences, saying, in part, toward the close of his review:

"In the four quarters of the globe, who reads an American book? or goes to an American play? or looks at an American picture or statue? What does the world yet owe to American physicians or surgeons? What new principle of philosophy, or improvement in the practice of navigation, has been derived from the Americans? Finally, we ask, in the whole circle of the sciences, what has been added by the Americans to the stock of human knowledge, or the means of human enjoyment?"

"Who reads an American book?" has long been a famous phrase. Its author, however, was speaking of conditions in 1820, when we had but one poet worthy of the name, Philip Freneau, and but one novelist whose works possessed undeniable power, Charles Brockden Brown. Cooper's novels were still unpublished. "Precaution" not appearing until later in 1820.

"130," New York City: "There are two quotations:

In Herbert's "Jacula Prudentum," 1651, (originally published in 1640 in "Wit's Recreation," as "Outlandish Proverbs,") is the following:

"Though the mills of God grind slowly, yet

"E pluribus unum," the Latin motto on American coins and on the obverse of the great seal of the United States, was originally proposed Aug. 10, 1776, by the committee of three—Benjamin Franklin, John Adams, and Thomas Jefferson—who had been appointed to prepare a device for the seal. The device itself was rejected, and it was not until June 20, 1782, that the motto was adopted as part of the second and successful device submitted by Charles Thomson, Secretary of Congress. In 1786 Congress further ordained that the legend should appear on one side of certain specified coins. The phrase "E pluribus unum" or "unus" is found in various classical authors.

DENEHOLM & McKAY COMPANY, Worcester, Mass.: "If 'C. P.,' Alexandria, Va., will send his name, we can inform him where he can procure a set of Richardson's 'Messages and Papers of the Presidents' at a very low price."

"A. M. T." New York City: "Will you kindly inform me where I can get Hubert Crackanthorpe's 'Wreckage' in this city?"

Near-sighted and weak-fingered; in his face—
Lean, large-nosed, carved of hook, and scuffed with care,
The brown eyes radiant with vivacity—

Valiant to travel, light in ragged luck,
Buffoon and poet, lover and casuist;
A deal of Ariel, and a streak of Puck,
And something of the Shorter Catechist.

C. V. DEANE, 35 West Thirty-third Street, New York City: "Where can I find the poem containing the lines:

"'To live in hearts we leave behind

In Thomas Campbell's "Hallowed Ground."

Appeals to Readers.

MISS MARGARET MILLER, 228 Allen Street, Buffalo, N. Y.: "I would like to obtain a copy of Mrs. John C. H. Dorr's 'Turning-Gate.'"

MISS J. LETTON, 2 Wooster Place, Newburyport, Mass.: "Where can I find the poem 'The Maids of Thirlmere'? Where can I obtain matter regarding a play-tragedy called 'Elsie, Duchess of the time of the Spanish occupation of the Netherlands? The play, I believe, was produced some years ago by the Kendrys."

M. MAROOWITH, 218 West Fifth Street, New York City: "Who is the author of the following lines:

"'All nature is but art unknown to thee,
All chance, direction which thou canst not see;
All discord, harmony not understood,

"W. H. R." One Hundred and Fifteenth Street, New York City: "Many years ago I read in an old English magazine a very clever poem upon authors' names, with reference to the prolific of books. Can any reader supply me with it? Two of the lines are as follows:

"R. C. S." New York: "I wonder if any of your readers who frequent the by-ways of English poetry can tell me who is the author of the following eighteenth century quatrain:

Lot him drink port!' the (present opponent)

The Magic Silk.

RED-HEADED OIL. By Rev. Cyrus. In one volume. 12mo. Cloth. Net, $1.20. New York: Henry Holt & Co. $1.20.

There is much originality in the plot of "Red-Headed Oil." Interwoven with a romance growing out of a nautical mare's nest of the Deinfield-Julie kind, is the strange potency of a piece of silk coming out of "the mysterious East, the poisonous East—birthplace and home of an ill-wind that blows nobody good." If the heroine wears hose as small a bit of this shimmering fabric of the Hindu loom, she dreams dreams and sees visions—in effect, her identity is changed, like that of Percy Lady Heavens into Lady Lizzie, and she lives the life of her ancestress of 300 years before. This weird element is well managed in connection with a very modern story. One cannot commend its naturalness; the East Indian magic is scarcely less improbable than its ordinary situations, of which the revolting marriage-bond is chief. All is plausibly told, however; the conversations are good, the Cornish features are of special interest; the reader's attention is at once enlisted, and is not allowed to flag. He is rewarded, moreover, by a happy ending.

Were there such things as title hours in the literature line, we should say that "Red-Headed Oil" is the very book for such a time.

"Leatherings" of English History.

"An English Garner" is to be issued in twelve volumes by Prof. Arber's "leatherings" of the history and literature of England. The texts contained in the previous editions, which consisted only of eight volumes, has been rearranged and classified. The pamphlets have been arranged in four groups—historical, geographical, social, and literary. Much new matter has been added. Each volume will have a detailed table of contents, and indexes will be provided for the historical and geographical volumes. Nine introductions have been written by experts on their subjects to supply a guide on the history and geography of the past. The writers are G. A. Aitken, who introduces "Late Stuart Tracts"; C. H. Firth, introducing "Stuart Tracts"; A. F. Pollard, introducing "Tudor Tracts"; C. Raymond Beazley, who writes the introduction to "Voyages and Travels"; Andrew Lang introduces "Social England in the Seventeenth Century," Churton Collins introduces "Critical Essays and Literary Fragments;" Sidney Lee writes the introduction for "Elizabethan Sonnets"; A. H. Bullen introduces "Longer Elizabethan Poems and Shorter Elizabethan Poems," and Alfred W. Pollard writes the introduction and provides a glossary for "Fifteenth Century Prose and Verse." The library will be issued in this country by E. P. Dutton. This week are appearing "Critical Essays and Literary Fragments," with introduction by Churton Collins. The volume includes Mere's "Palladis Tamia," and critical essays by Sidney, Dryden, Tickell, and others, concluding with Copleston's "Advice to a Young Reviewer." Two volumes are being brought out at the same time on "Voyages and Travels," mainly of the seventeenth century, edited, with two introductions and an index, by C. Raymond Beazley.

"A Washington Novel."

There is promised shortly by McClure, Phillips & Co. a novel that for the first time gives, it is declared, an adequate picture of Congressional diplomatic, and social life in Washington. It is said to reveal the true inwardness of the methods of politics as practised at the capital, and to reveal with an astonishing frankness the practices of the great American "bosses," as they show themselves by their effect in the Federal Legislature halls. The purely social side of Washington in its pitiful as well as its humorous aspects occupies a good share of the book, and is said to afford an unstrenuous though romantic background to the exciting and dramatic passages in which politics, the making and breaking of men, their characters and reputations, are the leading themes.

A Daughter of the Sioux" is the best as well as the latest of his always admirable stories of regular army life on the frontier.

The first edition of ten thousand copies was practically sold on date of publication (March 28) and the second edition is now spoken for, rendering a third edition necessary within a few weeks of its publication. The story is universally conceded to be the best ever written by this popular author.

FORTHCOMING BOOKS.

Another Work on the Bacon-Shakespeare Controversy.

"Is it Shakespeare?" is the title of a volume by "a Cambridge Graduate," which E. P. Dutton will publish in this country next week. It is published in London by John Murray. Taib "great question of Elizabethan literature," is, the sub-title says, "studied in the light of new revelations and new contemporary evidence." The author endeavors to show that Francis Bacon and not Shakespeare was the author of the poems and the sonnets attributed to the Avon bard. In his opening chapter he quotes the dedication of "The Rape of Lucrece," in which Shakespeare makes a remark about its being a "pamphlet without beginning," being "but a superfluous moiety." He continues:

Such a curious statement naturally leads one to examine the "beginning" of the pamphlet in its first edition as presented and dedicated to Southampton, and lo! the son "shows his head" at once, for the first two lines are headed by this monogram, "Fr. B.," which may well be called also a superfluous moiety of Fr. B (acon.) Fr. representing one-half of his name, with the superfluous B flowing over from the other half.

(FR)om the besieged (A)rden all in post

As evidence that he speaks authoritatively, the writer shows that Bacon signed himself "B., Fra.," when he wrote to his uncle and aunt, Lord and Lady Burghley. The poems and sonnets, says the author, were written by a man who was an aristocrat by birth and feeling. But was he a scholar? he asks. The opinion of the Shakespeareans is that he was not a bookish scholar, but a born genius. The Baconians say that the author of the plays and poems was a good scholar, an excellent linguist, especially in French, and a man of the highest intellectual ability and most deep philosophy, with an unparalleled vocabulary. But, while he agrees with the latter side, the author says that there is foundation in the belief that the writer was a "bookish scholar." His conclusion is, however, that Bacon is the author of the poems and sonnets.

Dr. Dwight on Yale College.

Dr. Timothy Dwight's "Memories of Yale Life and Men" is in active preparation at Dodd, Mead & Co.'s for publication before the Yale Commencement. The author was President of the college for thirteen years. He entered it from the Hopkins Grammar School of New Haven, in 1845. In the opening chapters of the book Dr. Dwight gives a description of the Hopkins School and the Principal, Hawley Olmstead, who from 1820 to 1849 carried forward the work of instruction in the school, "and devoted himself to the interests of its pupils." It was he who prepared Dr. Dwight for his Yale examinations. The second chapter deals with the "Beginnings of College Life." He describes the college entrance examinations and inserts the college catalogue for 1845. When Dr. Dwight entered his sophomore year Dr. Woolsey became President.

The chapter following tells about the "Earliest College Teachers, 1845-6—The Instruction and Discipline of that Period." Among the teachers he mentions Prof. Thacher. The man, he says, "seemed always to understand and lay hold of what was central in its importance in the lesson of the day or the subject brought before us. With the utmost distinctness and clearness he presented it to our minds. He knew just what to say, and just how to say it, to the end of making each one of us comprehend and appreciate what we were trying to learn."

For the Young Teacher.

"A Broader Elementary Education," by J. P. Lord of the School of Pedagogy, New York University, which Hinds & Noble are publishing, is "an attempt to show what the elementary school must do if it is to stop treating its pupils as beings who are to learn things with a view merely to the practical side of life." The elementary school, says the author, should aim to give the elements of a liberal education from the start. He has endeavored to show that the "very notion of education implies a conception of the mind which is fundamentally at variance with widely prevalent notions." Mr. Lord continues:

If any one should say that parts of the book are too difficult for young teachers, I reply with the following questions: Which is more helpful to these, a book that treats of education in a fundamental way (as his does) or one that skims over the surface, leaving all difficulties out of sight? And can the subject of education be treated in a fundamental way, without determining what is involved in the very notion of education, the nature of the child, the end to be reached, and the means to be employed in attaining it?

Wilbur J. Chamberlin's Book.

When the late Wilbur J. Chamberlin was in China during the foreign invasion which succeeded the Boxer uprising he wrote nearly every day to his wife letters filled with suggestive impressions regarding the persons whom he met and the things which he saw. Mr. Chamberlin's sister, after carefully editing the letters, has finally decided to give them to the public, and they will be printed this Spring with the imprint of the Frederick A. Stokes Company. Of course it is readily conceivable that many of those choicest morsels of personal criticism calculated to give pain to certain civilians and military men who were in Pekin with Mr. Chamberlin have been omitted; still enough remains to warrant calling it an intimate and candid statement of the whole "China business "from beginning to end.

Goethe's "Egmont."

Goethe's "Egmont," edited with introduction and notes by Prof. Robert Weller Deering of Western Reserve University, is being published this week by Henry Holt & Co. When Prof. Deering began work on the play no edition of it had appeared in America that was adequate for modern needs. Prof. Deering's text, we are told in the preface, is based on the Weimar edition, with such changes as seemed necessary in comparison with Goethe's own manuscript. Prof. Deering's notes are devoted to the historical allusions of the play and to such difficulties and construction and idiom as seemed to need explanation. There is also a bibliography which includes the latest and best books on the various phases of the subject.

In his introduction Prof. Deering discusses the composition of "Egmont," the historical background, the different characters, the dramatic structure of the play, the style and tone. He closes with a criticism of the play, giving Schiller's criticism, which, he says, was unjust, because Schiller did not understand "Egmont" as it really is. In 1796 Schiller revised the play, and thus proved the great difference between the two poets. The younger man's changes, which extend throughout the whole play, are due chiefly to his desire for greater clearness and effectiveness of the stage.

Though "Egmont" is regarded as one of Goethe's best works, says Prof. Deering, the public does not even yet appreciate it fully, though it has been on the German stage since 1828. He continues:

The spectator is profoundly touched, and yet on comparing it with other plays he feels that there is something lacking to his complete satisfaction. The reason in a word is perhaps that Goethe cared too little for external, visible action and for theatrical effect. Orthodox tragedy demands tangible action, positive development in the character of the hero, evident conflict in his own heart of a great issue which he forces upon his enemies, and a tragic guilt which inevitably leads to his ruin. . . . Perhaps the greatest fault of the play is the fact that Goethe expects too much of his readers and thinks less of the judgment, taste, and emotional needs of the public than a great teacher should. In this respect "Egmont" is like all his other dramas—they were not intended to be popular, they were not written for the masses, they are denied the highest stage effects, but they are soul pictures of tremendous power.

Some Summer Book Lists.

Three brochures of lists of books are worth noting at this time. The Macmillan Company are issuing a twenty-three-page catalogue containing "a list of important new books published at net prices under the rules of the American Publishers' Association." The list includes belles lettres, essays, biography; the English Men of Letters series, books on history, travel, and description; politics, economics, sociology, &c.; theology, sports, and so on. On the last page are an alphabetical list and index of the contents of the book.

Harper & Brother have in preparation a brochure containing descriptions of "Ideal Books for Idle Hours." The pamphlet includes descriptions of the latest work of such authors as Mrs. Humphry Ward, William Dean Howells, J. J. Bell, Will N. Harben, Anthony Hope, Mary E. Wilkins Freeman, Gilbert Parker, Cyrus Townsend Brady, and Lilian Bell. There are to be fifty titles in all.

The J. B. Lippincott Company of Philadelphia are sending out an illustrated catalogue of their "Spring Books, 1903." Among the authors mentioned in the pamphlet are Prof. Angelo Heilprin, William Eleroy Curtis, Horace Howard Furness, Jr., Marcus B. P. Dorman, George Moore, Mabell Shipple Clarke Pelton, and a number of others. Descriptions are given of the stories, of the make-up of the books, and the prices.

Jack London's New Book.

"The Call of the Wild," the new story by Jack London, author of "Children of the Frost," will be published by the Macmillan Company early in the Summer. Mr. London has chosen a new theme. He tells the story of a dog, Buck by name. The book opens in the Autumn of 1897. The hero is then four years old, and is a large and beautiful St. Bernard. He is stolen from a kind master and taken to the Klondike by a Scotchman in search of gold. There Buck is ill-fed, ill-treated, and almost dies. After many months the dog is rescued by a man who proves to be a good master. Buck wins a large sum of money for him. But his master is killed by the Indians, and Buck joins the hosts of wolves and becomes a savage. The book, it is said, is in no respect overemotional. The story is compared to Ernest Seton Thompson's "Biography of a Grizzly," except that there are human beings in Mr. London's work.

Centenary Edition of Emerson.

April 27 was the twenty-first anniversary of the death of Ralph Waldo Emerson. Plans are on foot for the celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of his birth, which falls on May 25. Houghton, Mifflin & Co. will bring out the first volumes of Emerson's works on May 30. The forthcoming edition has been edited, with an introduction, by Edward Waldo Emerson, who has given a short account of his father's life and work. The text used is that of the present Riverside Edition, which was prepared during Emerson's lifetime by his friend and biographer, J. Elliot Cabot. At the end of each volume will be notes by the editor, and it is said that much new material has been added, while a full index will be given to the entire works.

UNDER THE ROSE

BY FREDERIC S. ISHAM.

AUTHOR OF "THE STROLLERS." ILLUSTRATED BY HOWARD CHANDLER CHRISTY.

THE READER MAGAZINE, noted for its discriminating book reviews, says: "The dish of romance in UNDER THE ROSE is served up with plenty of cayenne pepper from beginning to end; it is romance, romance and all the time romance, and therefore precisely what we want when pressed by the realities of life."
